In 1924 the estate tax rates were increased by an amendment which I myself sponsored, making the highest rate on that portion of the estate over $10,000,000, 40 per cent. In 1924 we secured this increase which I thought was fair, which the majority of both Houses of Congress thought was fair, and which became law. Following the enactment of these rates in 1924 there was a tremendous drive to repeal the entire estate tax law. Then was enacted the revenue law of 1926, which reduced the highest rate on that portion of the estate over $10,000,000 from 40 per cent to 20 per cent, and increased the exemption from $50,000 to $100,000 and that is the law now. The exemption is $100,000 and the rates run from 1 to 20 per cent, the 20 per cent taking effect on that portion of the estate over $10,000,000.

Some of the best economists of the country and some of the leading business men and well-known statesmen of the country have favored the estate tax. I am not going to take time to-day to quote from them. During the last three or four months four large organizations of producers have gone on record in favor of increasing the estate tax. They are the American Farm Bureau Federation, at its convention held in Chicago recently; the National Grange, at its annual convention in Madison, Wis.; the National Farmers' Union, at its annual convention in Des Moines, Iowa; and the American Federation of Labor, at its annual convention held this year at Vancouver, in British Columbia.

Last spring, after Congress adjourned, instead of going home like many of you folks did, I stayed here chiefly to study the tax problem and the problem of stabilizing the purchasing power of money. What I am giving to you to-day is the result of my study last spring on taxation. I intend at some early future date to address you on the subject of stabilizing the purchasing power of money.

Confronted with a Treasury deficit for this fiscal year and the next the revision of our tax laws to yield more revenue will be pressed for consideration. Those interested in a just and equitable system of taxation should not delay a careful and thorough study of our tax problems. The ordinary expenditures of Government should be met by revenue derived from taxation. Borrowing in peace time to meet the public expenditures can not be carried on over a period of years without grave results. Public debts can be justified only for two purposes: First, to meet a temporary emergency, and second, to provide permanent public improvements. Debts for the latter purpose should be limited and with sinking-fund provisions to retire them within at least 25 years.

During the last 40 years we have witnessed a great and an unwarranted increase in the ordinary expenditures of Government—Federal, State, and local. The total for 1890 was $855,000,000; for 1928 the total was $12,813,000,000. These sums for the years referred to are allocated as follows:

Federal	$291,000,000
State	77,000,000
Local	487,000,000
1928
Federal	3,970,000,000
State	1,826,000,000
Local	6,813,000,000

The World War is responsible for the major portion of the increase in Federal expenditures. Since that war the Federal Government has reduced taxes and debts. The State and local governments have increased taxes and debts. Now the Federal Government is confronted with a curtailment of its debt-reduction policy and also a revision of the tax laws in the near future to increase the receipts.

For an increase in Federal revenues, to what sources shall we turn? My answer is to estate, inheritance, and gift taxes.

Andrew Carnegie, one of the richest men of his generation, was an intelligent, enthusiastic, and persistent advocate of estate and inheritance taxes. It was his view that every fortune left by a hoarder should contribute to the support of government in proportion to its size, leaving exempt small amounts to dependents of the decedent, but graduate the rates upward until with the enormous fortunes reaching into many millions, at least one-half should go to the Public Treasury.

The estate tax is a just tax and does not in the least stifle enterprise, initiative, and the accumulations of wealth. Of all forms of taxation this seems the wisest. The objects of estate and inheritance taxes are: First, to prevent the accumulations of wealth in the hands of those who contributed nothing or little to its creation, and, second, to lighten the burdens of taxation weighing so heavily on the backs of the masses.

No one can view the concentration of wealth and the concentration in the control of wealth during the last 30 years in this country without apprehension and alarm.

The World War stimulated the tendency toward concentration of wealth. We have had a Federal income tax since 1913. A study of the income-tax returns is illuminating on this point. The number of individuals making returns of incomes of $50,000 and over for the year 1914 was 7,509; for the year 1919 the number was 18,846; and for the year 1929 the number was 38,650.

For the five years 1925–1929 the individual net income class under $10,000 required to file returns under the law decreased from 3,844,033 to 3,662,948; the net income class between $10,000 and $100,000 increased from 317,458 to 357,053; and the net income class over $100,000 increased from 9,560 to 14,701.

Taking into a separate group the individuals who made returns on $1,000,000 and over, we find an increase from 290 in 1925 to 504 in 1929. During the same time the total incomes of this group increased from $465,002,745 in 1925 to $1,354,123,656 in 1929. There is but one deduction from these figures and that is that since 1914 there has been a large increase in the concentration of wealth, the rich have grown richer, while those with net incomes under $10,000 and the great mass of those who do not have sufficient incomes to file income-tax returns have had a hard time to hold their own and possibly lost ground. It is apparent that this latter group is not getting its share of the fruits of industry and at the same time is carrying a constantly increasing burden imposed by State and local governments.

We have had a Federal estate tax since 1916. Since the war there have been several drives to repeal the law. Those seeking repeal almost succeeded in 1926. Under the 1926 law the exemption on each estate was raised from $50,000 to $100,000. The maximum rate is 20 per cent on the brackets over $10,000,000, and the States by adjusting their laws to the Federal law can retain 80 per cent of the estate tax imposed by the Federal Treasury.

Now, here are some figures which I want you to get, and if you get nothing else from this address I want you to get the facts and figures that I am about to give you.

In recent years the total Federal and State estate and inheritance taxes amounted to about $180,000,000 annually, of which around $60,000,000 go into the Federal Treasury. In a few years the part going to the Federal Treasury under existing law will be about $40,000,000 a year.

How much revenue should be derived from estate and inheritance taxes? In 1892 Mr. Carnegie, in a carefully prepared statement based on the national wealth and the amount of property that devolved on account of the death of the owners, estimated that at moderate rates $300,000,000 annually could be collected from this source, a sum at that time more than sufficient to pay all the ordinary expenditures of the Federal Government. He said:

> Every dollar of taxes required might be obtained in this manner without interfering in the least with the forces which tend to the development of the country through the production of wealth. It would be a tax easily and surely collectible.

Now our national wealth and the amount of property that devolves on account of the death of the owners are six times what they were in 1892. On the same basis of computation used by Carnegie we could now collect from this source six times $300,000,000, or $1,800,000,000 "without interfering in the least with the forces which tend to the development of the country through the production of wealth," instead of $180,000,000 now collected from this source by both Federal and State Governments.

Great Britain during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1931, collected from death duties nearly $400,000,000. The conservatives of Great Britain are responsible for the productiveness of their inheritance taxes. Our national wealth is four times that of Great Britain. On a proportionate basis we would collect $1,600,000,000 annually.

Recently I asked the chief of staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation to prepare a schedule of rates which would collect a half billion dollars, that is, $500,000,000 annually. I have that table before me, and I am going to insert it in the RECORD. I am not going to read it to you nor discuss it. However, I have stated on other occasions that in my judgment we could easily collect at least $500,000,000 or $600,000,000 from this source. Certainly we could collect from this source $500,000,000 or $600,000,000 very much easier than Great Britain can collect $400,000,000, with only one-fourth of the national wealth we have. As I have stated, Great Britain collected $400,000,000 during the last fiscal year, and I am reliably informed that this year it is estimated she will collect $450,000,000 from estate taxes.

Mr. HOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. Will the gentleman give us the maximum rate under the figures submitted by the Treasury?

Mr. RAMSEYER. The figures are from the experts of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation. In the table I have before me the exemption is $50,000. It starts with a rate of 1 per cent on the first $10,000 above the exemption; then the rates are increased to 45 per cent on that portion of the estate over $15,000,000. The rates run from 1 per cent to 45 per cent.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is less than the English rate?

Mr. RAMSEYER. The English maximum rate is 40 per cent.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. What would be the gentleman's attitude toward creating from five to ten billion dollars more of nontaxable securities? We have legislation pending before the Banking and Currency Committee looking to about that amount, as I figure it.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That question really is not relevant to what I am discussing. I have on a number of occasions discussed the debt problem, and my attitude has always been against increasing the public debt and in favor of paying off the public debt just as fast as possible.

Mr. STEVENSON. This, however, is not the public debt but refers to proposed issues of absolutely tax-free securities by semigovernmental institutions.

Mr. RAMSEYER. If the Banking and Currency Committee reports out such bills, the gentleman is a member of that committee, and a mighty good member of the committee, then with the assistance of his enlightened judgment I shall try to arrive at right and sound conclusions.

The productiveness of our estate and inheritance taxes is greatly reduced by the wholesale avoidance of those taxes by the rich. By gifts and trusts their estates escape the inheritance and estate taxes. This is a loophole in our laws that can only be closed by the imposition of a gift tax. Recently the Supreme Court denied a writ to review a case from the lower court holding over 95 per cent of the John Wanamaker $40,000,000 estate exempt from the estate tax because of a gift made thereof by the father to his son within two years of the father's death. In 1919 John D. Rockefeller was reputed to be the largest income-tax payer, running into many millions. Public records disclose that since the war he pays as little as $12,000 annual income tax. It is generally understood that Edsel Ford is a larger income-tax payer than his father, Henry Ford. Why either a Rockefeller or a Ford should pay no tax on the transfer of hundreds of millions of dollars to his son and a Whitney should pay $20,000,000 on the transfer of a little over $100,000,000 to his son is not apparent. In the one case the transfer was made before death, while in the other the transfer was made after death. A tax on gifts and trusts is absolutely essential to preserve and to make productive the estate and inheritance taxes. [Applause.]

The provision of the Federal estate tax allowing an 80 per cent credit to the States is unjust and unsound economically. A large fortune is interstate in character and but a small part thereof may have been produced in the State where the owner lives. For instance, New York pays a large share of the income and estate taxes into the Federal Treasury. That is not due entirely to the income produced and the tangible wealth within New York. In New York are the evidences of the title to much of the property scattered throughout the United States. Because of this situation New York, under this 80 per cent credit provision, is enabled to derive revenue from estates out of all proportion to the basic wealth of the State, the wealth actually produced in the State, or the population of the State. The 80 per cent credit provision should be either repealed or the credit allowed States greatly reduced on large estates.

By reducing the exemption, by revising and increasing the rates, by imposing a gift tax—all within constructive and moderate bounds—the estate and inheritance taxes can be made productive of large revenue to meet public expenditures, to pay off the national debt, and to relieve tax burdens. This is a job for the Federal Government. The States can not and will not develop this form of taxation.

To those who may still doubt the wisdom, justness, and expediency of estate and inheritances taxes with productive rates and effective provisions I commend a study of Carnegie's article entitled "The Gospel of Wealth."

Especially to the younger Members of this House who have never given much study to this proposition, I recommend the reading of this essay of Andrew Carnegie. All you have to do is to send over to the Library for it and you can read it in an hour.

Then he has another essay entitled "My Partners, the People." I think this is better than his Gospel of Wealth. This was published in the British Review of Reviews back in the nineties sometime, and there is nothing more enlightening that you can read, either on wealth or on the justness of estate taxes, than Andrew Carnegie's two articles to which I have just referred.

I also commend to you the writings of economists from John Stuart Mill down to the able and learned economists of our own day.

The prophet Hosea, in a period of his country's distress, cried out, "My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge." The need of the present to solve the economic problems before us is knowledge and courage.

I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. Did I understand the gentleman to say that all States had increased their debts since the war?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I stated that the States and local governments had increased debts.

Mr. GOSS. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that my State of Connecticut during this period has reduced its debt and is now out of debt.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I am glad to have that information. I congratulate the government of the gentleman's State on its exceptional record in debt reduction.

Mr. Chairman, under leave to extend my remarks I submit the following for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL REVENUE TAXATION,
Washington, December 11, 1931.

Hon. C. W. RAMSEYER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: You recently requested a statement as to the rates of estate tax which it would be necessary to impose upon all estates with a net value in excess of $50,000 in order to produce a total revenue of approximately $500,000,000 without taking account of any credit allowed for State inheritance taxes paid.

It is estimated that the following schedule of rates would produce an annual revenue of $415,000,000 if imposed on all estates of over $50,000.

Amount of estate after $50,000 exemption:	Rate, per cent
0 to $10,000	1
$10,000 to $20,000	2
$20,000 to $30,000	3
$30,000 to $40,000	4
$40,000 to $50,000	5
$50,000 to $75,000	6
$75,000 to $100,000	7
$100,000 to $150,000	8
$150,000 to $200,000	9
$200,000 to $250,000	10
$250,000 to $300,000	11
$300,000 to $400,000	12
$400,000 to $500,000	13
$500,000 to $600,000	14
$600,000 to $700,000	15
$700,000 to $800,000	16
$800,000 to $1,000,000	17
$1,000,000 to $1,250,000	18
$1,250,000 to $1,500,000	19
$1,500,000 to $1,750,000	20
$1,750,000 to $2,000,000	21
$2,000,000 to $2,250,000	22
$2,250,000 to $2,500,000	23
$2,500,000 to $2,750,000	24
$2,750,000 to $3,000,000	25
$3,000,000 to $3,250,000	26
$3,250,000 to $3,500,000	27
$3,500,000 to $3,750,000	28
$3,750,000 to $4,000,000	29
$4,000,000 to $4,250,000	30
$4,250,000 to $4,500,000	31
$4,500,000 to $4,750,000	32
$4,750,000 to $5,000,000	33
$5,000,000 to $5,500,000	34
$5,500,000 to $6,000,000	35
$6,000,000 to $6,500,000	36
$6,500,000 to $7,000,000	37
$7,000,000 to $7,500,000	38
$7,500,000 to $8,000,000	39
$8,000,000 to $8,500,000	40
$8,500,000 to $9,000,000	41
$9,000,000 to $9,500,000	42
$9,500,000 to $10,000,000	43
$10,000,000 to $15,000,000	44
Over $15,000,000	45

It is estimated that the net value of the estates subject to the above rates would be about $4,000,000,000 annually before subtracting the specific exemption of $50,000 each. Thus the average rate of tax on these estates at the rate set forth is about 10 per cent.

Our national wealth is now estimated to be in the neighborhood of $360,000,000,000. If we assume that property devolves on the average of about once in 35 years, then approximately $10,000,000,000 in gross value of property devolves annually. Of course, there is a very considerable amount of property passing in the smaller estates in connection with which we have no statistics.

Trusting the above will meet your requirements,

Very respectfully,

L. H. PARKER,
Chief of Staff.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. SWANK].

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, we have assembled here in this, the greatest law-making body on earth, and our mission is to legislate for the American people, whom we have the honor to represent. It is, therefore, our solemn duty to do everything within our power for the people. Regardless of what certain favored and high-powered politicians may say, we are now confronted with the most serious situation that we ever faced. On every hand we see poverty, misery, and suffering unequaled in your time or mine. Heretofore a man could find some kind of work to provide for himself and family. Now our highways are filled with men, women, and little children trudging along looking for work, and many times, in their extremities, begging for bread. Never before in America have so many men and women been out of work. And yet, Mr. Chairman, the ear of this administration has not heard the cry of our women and children, and if it heard it heeded not, and the same administration has been in complete control of this Government for the past 11 years. There should always be work in this country that our citizens may not suffer for something to eat and wear. These people who walk the highways looking for work are not beggars, tramps, and worthless wanderers. In most instances they would like an opportunity to work, but it can not be found at any price.

Some of our large industrial concerns, headed by the so-called captains of industry, are engaged in wage reduction and the replacing of man power with machinery, and that without any reduction in the hours of employment for their workers. Then, in addition to this foolish policy advocated by some of these same captains of industry, a general reduction in wages is advocated. I am opposed to such a plan and would like to see a condition whereby all workers in private enterprises and in public work would receive reasonable wages, that they could properly provide for their families. When our town and city workers receive good wages they buy more of the farmers' produce, and the farmers are helped, as are the rest of the people. Our farmers should receive a fair price for what they produce in order that they can also live like other people and enjoy some of the comforts of life as well as the bare necessities. Agriculture is our basic industry and the one upon which all others depend. All that we eat and all that we wear are produced on the farm. When the farmers receive a fair price for the products of their toil there is a general wave of prosperity throughout the land, but when depression hits them, then it is felt in every line of business. When we legislate for agriculture and our wage earners we legislate for all the people. Out on the farm and among those who work we find our real Christian Americanism. Our farmers and wage earners ask no special favors of this Congress and only ask to be treated like other citizens.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to see this administration look to our own domestic affairs instead of trying to get a moratorium on the debts owing us by foreign countries and which they agreed to pay, and stirring up sentiment for complete cancellation of those debts, to which I am opposed. [Applause.] We often hear the question of what caused this depression and what can be done about it. One of the chief causes is the Smoot-Hawley tariff law enacted by this Republican administration in the last Congress. That law has almost destroyed our foreign markets, as the figures show. In 1920 our foreign exports amounted to the enormous sum of $8,100,000,000, and under the present tariff law our exports have dwindled to $3,843,181,000 in 1930. Then, some politicians ask what caused the slump. In order to have a good price we must have a market in which to sell our so-called surplus. By reason of this destruction of our foreign markets we have seen the farmers' products fall to the lowest level for many years. The records of the Department of Agriculture show that it cost our farmers on an average 89 cents per bushel to produce corn in 1930. The same year it cost them $1.09 per bushel to produce wheat, and from 50 cents to 54 cents per bushel to produce oats. These same records show that it cost our cotton farmers 16 cents per pound to produce cotton in 1930. The production costs for these products will be about the same for 1931, and this fall corn sold for from 25 cents to 30 cents per bushel, wheat as low as 25 cents per bushel, oats 15 cents per bushel, and cotton as low as 4 cents per pound in the lint. The farmers can not continue to produce under such conditions.

Mr. Chairman, on the 24th day of September, 1931, Congressman MARTIN DIES, of Texas, and I, personally, presented to the President of the United States the following program, which would do much to relieve the present unemployment situation and also provide permanent relief:

PROGRAM SUBMITTED

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 24, 1931.

To Hon. HERBERT HOOVER,
President of the United States:

Believing that the present economic crisis is wholly unjustified in view of the tremendous wealth and surplus that exist in every line of industry and the inexhaustible resources of our country, we feel that an immediate special session of Congress is urgently needed. The situation is national and Congress can find and apply an adequate solution. To sit idly by and indulge the vain hope that the situation will right itself is to acknowledge the inability of popular government to promote and insure the happiness and welfare of its people. Even should the situation right itself, the tremendous loss in wages and earnings, the destruction of public confidence, and the suffering and privation entailed would constitute an indictment against our administration of government.

If the present situation could be traced to famine, droughts, and unavoidable events, little could be expected from legislative enactments except temporary relief measures. But with an abundance of wealth and surplus of everything, unemployment and wholesale bankruptcies are inexcusable and must be attributed to unnatural causes that can be controlled by Congress.

We, therefore, respectfully request that Congress be immediately convened in extraordinary session, and that a constructive program be submitted that will provide temporary and permanent relief; that we devise ways and means of forever preventing a recurrence of the ridiculous spectacle of widespread unemployment, want, and suffering in a land of plenty. We submit that such a program, in order to be adequate and effective, must include the following:

(1) An appropriation of sufficient money to immediately inaugurate a great construction and improvement program in every part of the Nation, to provide for immediate employment for our people. To insure this employment we suggest that provision be made on all public highways for the work to be done by man power and that labor-saving devices and machines be dispensed with, so far as possible. The same aid should be given farm-to-market or post roads as is given to State highways. This provision will immediately give employment to all. Such a program will not only give employment now but will insure needed improvements and construction. This building program would consist of Federal buildings, waterways improvement, and flood-control work. Many of our waterways and deep-water projects are receiving inadequate aid from the Government. For example, the Sabine-Neches waterways of southeast Texas, over which one-fifth of the tonnage of the Nation moves, and which urgently need deepening, widening, and many other necessary improvements. We urge prevention of flood damage on the Mississippi and tributaries by impounding the waters in reservoirs. This work, in addition to assisting in controlling the floods, will relieve droughts, furnish needed food, and give jobs to thousands of worthy citizens. In Oklahoma surveys have been made and sites located for reservoirs.

We cite these instances because they are familiar to us. They illustrate the great need throughout the Nation for public improvements that would, from a business standpoint, amply justify the expenditure, provide employment, and restore normal conditions. Such a program, to be effectual, must be inaugurated at once and carried on with vigor and energy, and not postponed until the next presidential campaign. Most of the States of the Nation, and especially Texas and Oklahoma, are ready to cooperate, and, with conferences with industrial concerns and business enterprises throughout the Nation, private cooperation can be secured and the hours and days of work shortened to offset the displacement of man power by the labor-saving devices, so that every man in the United States desiring work can be immediately given a job, and within 90 days the economic depression will be lifted and the Nation restored to prosperity.

(2) That the Government use cotton paper, cloth, and twine, exclusive of all other kinds and that a national program be inaugurated by the President and the Department of Agriculture, enlisting the support of the American people in an effort to use more cotton clothing and cotton goods. This will create a great demand for cotton and double the price.

(3) Prevent the Department of Agriculture in making crop estimates from including "bollies" in the estimates. The enactment of laws to prevent interstate shipments of "bollie" cotton. This will do much to stimulate the price.

(4) That a moratorium for one year be granted on mortgage foreclosures on homesteads and, if necessary to make this effective, that Congress enact such laws with reference to Federal loans and that the several States be urged to enact similar laws on State foreclosures.

(5) All immigration from every country should be prohibited for a period of five years to enable us to absorb the labor surplus. We should enact at once adequate deportation laws that will enable us to immediately deport the several million foreigners illegally in our country and those who are legally here but have committed a criminal offense.

(6) We urge the enactment of necessary laws to prevent gambling and wild speculation on the stock exchange. One of the contributing causes of our present economic crisis was the inflation of stocks and securities beyond all reasonable proportions, that unscrupulous promoters might make untold millions at the expense of the unsuspecting public.

(7) The regulation of our banking system in order to restrain the individual greed in the management of our banks, our railways, and large industrial corporations. It is difficult to believe that any country as rich as ours and in the midst of plenty would be embarrassed as we are and faced with distress and unemployment if we had a well-balanced banking system. Take that control out of the hands of a few men.

The submission of these questions, along with other matters that your judgment may dictate, will enable Congress immediately to provide for temporary and permanent relief and will prevent untold suffering and privation this winter, save billions of dollars in loss of wages and earnings, and accelerate the return of normal conditions. The legislatures of different States are meeting in special session, but they find it difficult, if not impossible, to adequately deal with the situation that is national in cause and effect.

In conclusion, we wish to assure you that our only motive in submitting this request is to cooperate with you in this distressing time in restoring confidence in our Nation and bringing immediate relief to the millions of our fellow citizens who find themselves unemployed, their resources exhausted, and their future darkened. These questions can be handled before the hardships of winter begin by a special session of Congress now.

Respectfully submitted.

A great construction and improvement program should be started at once and not wait until 1932, when the campaign will begin. If such a plan were adopted and the work done with man power instead of with machinery so far as possible, it would put every man to work now. Large construction on our waterways and flood control needs to be done which would be of great benefit to the country in general and to Oklahoma in particular. I have communicated with the Bureau of Reclamation and the Bureau of Public Roads on the use of more man power and mention this to show that I am trying to do something to relieve present conditions. New uses for cotton must be found. Only recently the Post Office Department submitted bids for 1,300,000 pounds of cotton twine for six months for that one department of Government. That one item alone, in one department, will cause to be used 5,200 bales more of cotton each year. All other departments of the Government should follow suit. Our program calls for that to be done. The newspapers carried reports that the sugar industry was going to use cotton sacks instead of imported burlap. Then, in my judgment, the Department of Agriculture should not include "bollie" cotton in its production estimates, for it depresses the price and thereby injures the cotton farmers. In my opinion there should be a thorough and complete investigation of the Federal Farm Board to determine its activities in relation to the wheat and cotton crop, and I shall exert my efforts for a congressional investigation.

This plan also provides for a moratorium of one year on mortgage foreclosures, and if this time were granted many homes could be saved without loss to anyone. Then all immigration should be prohibited for at least a time. Workers should not be imported from other countries when we have so many millions of our own people out of work. The stock exchanges can and should be controlled or abolished. All that is necessary to achieve this result is to have an administration that wants to control them and prevent their wild and unscrupulous speculations and ruinous policy toward our people. Our banking system must be taken out of the hands of a few men and placed back in Congress, for the Constitution provides that the Congress shall have power to "coin money and regulate the value thereof." Congress can and should issue money and not pay the large banks to issue the money.

Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, this program would be of lasting benefit to our country, and let us unite and do something to relieve the distressful conditions that confront us. I am ready to support any plan that will provide relief for the people of our common land. Work must be provided or a direct appropriation made, for our hungry must not starve and our needy freeze this winter.

I am glad to say that our program has the personal indorsement of many citizens. The president of the Farmers Union of Oklahoma, Hon. Tom W. Cheek, wrote me that this program is right in line with the Farmers Union program. I also received the following letter from the Oklahoma City Trades and Labor Council:

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., October 17, 1931.

Hon. F. B. SWANK,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SWANK: At the meeting of the Oklahoma City Trades and Labor Council, held October 15, a motion was unanimously adopted indorsing your recommendation to the President of the United States for an extra session of Congress to consider the program outlined in your petition.

Trusting that you may get fruits from this move and thanking you for your interest in the cause of the unemployed, we are

Yours very truly,
OKLAHOMA CITY TRADES AND LABOR COUNCIL.
JOHN HOWE, Secretary.

These indorsements come from great labor organizations which are interested in the general welfare of our country, and I appreciate them more than words can tell. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN].

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, when I came to this session of Congress I was opposed to the moratorium. The reason why I was opposed to it was because I believed that it directly benefited only the international bankers and the citizens who had investments in foreign loans. Last summer when the President wired the Members of Congress asking their position on the moratorium I replied that I should not be interested in the moratorium unless it was associated with a program which would stabilize other lines of business as well as the investments in foreign securities.

The message of the President to the Congress outlines a program which should aid and stabilize the financial structure of this country from Wall Street to Main Street.

Aid for Federal land banks, a home-loan discount bank to give immediate relief to embarrassed savings banks and building and loan associations, a reconstruction corporation to handle credits and securities of all kinds until property values return to a more normal value, together with the moratorium, should stabilize our entire financial system, which is tottering.

The President in his message advised the Congress that a few weeks since the huge sum of $250,000,000 was weekly being withdrawn from the banks in currency and hidden away. If this situation had continued for 20 weeks the entire $5,000,000,000 in circulation and outside of the Federal Treasury would have been withdrawn from American banks. Such a condition would have closed every bank in America, from the largest to the smallest. The chaos which would follow such a situation no man can comprehend. The time has come for quick and effective action upon the part of the Government. The Government is the only possible institution in America which can meet this emergency. The immediate and vital needs of the Nation demand that the Congress act posthaste and lay aside until a later date partisan bickering and personal animosity.

As to the moratorium, no man has less use for the international bankers and their conduct in making foreign loans than have I. When they made these loans they were far more interested in brokerage fees than in safe security. For several years they have been running the banking business of the country in a high-handed manner. They have been instrumental in centralizing the banking system and the wealth of the country until the Government can not permit these New York banks to go broke without carrying down with them the banks throughout the Nation.

No matter what these international bankers made in the past, they do not have the money at this time. Their profits have been book profits and have vanished. I call the attention of the Congress to the selling prices of the stock in these banks. The stock in the Chase National Bank has gone from a top of $893 in 1928 down to $40 on November 30, 1931, and on down to $31 Saturday, December 12, of this year. The value of the stock in this bank has decreased 25 per cent during the last 12 days. The stock of the National City Bank of New York has fallen from a top of something like $650 a share to $51 a share on November 30 of this year, and to $41 a share on December 12 this year. The stock of this bank has decreased 20 per cent within the last 12 days.

No man in Congress has any idea that the interest is going to be paid on these foreign loans, whether Congress approves or disapproves the moratorium. Congressional approval or disapproval of the moratorium can have no other effect than possibly to stabilize or further to demoralize an already tottering world-wide banking system.

The President has submitted a general program to the Congress which will stabilize the banking and business conditions in America from New York City to Elk City, if indeed it is possible to accomplish that much needed and desired purpose. I take it that Secretary Mellon was apprised of the contents of the President's message before it was sent to the Congress. Since that message includes Federal Government support for frozen credits down to deposits in closed banks, it is an unconditional surrender on the part of centralized wealth. It is an open admission by big business that it can not be saved unless individual business is saved. If we Congressmen from rural sections may quickly realize that small business can not be stabilized if big business completely and abruptly fail, then there is some promise that America is on the highway leading to the land of hope.

I regret exceedingly that partisanship is running so high in the debate on the moratorium. If it must be viewed in a partisan sense, I should ask the question: Which party and which administration is deserving of the more censure, the party and administration which can not collect the interest on some worthless foreign debts or the party and administration which granted these worthless loans to foreign countries? [Applause.] There has never been a day since these loans were made that the United States could collect them. When these loans were made the Wilson administration evidently thought they were virtually worthless and would never be paid. At least, that administration did not go to the trouble of so much as obtaining a written I O U for them.

I am not here to criticize the making of those loans. I assume that the Wilson administration made them upon the theory that it was absolutely necessary for the Government of the United States to lend this money to a war-impoverished Europe in order that a world-wide banking structure might again be reestablished. It seems apparent that this administration is foregoing the interest on these loans for another year upon the theory that it is necessary to do so in order to try to preserve a world-wide banking structure. I do not assume for a moment that Woodrow Wilson made these loans for the purpose of throwing away the money of the American people. I do not assume for a moment that Herbert Hoover is foregoing the receipt of the interest on these loans for the purpose of beating the taxpayers of the United States out of something they might otherwise receive.

The Government of the United States at this moment must either take its choice in letting the liquidation go on or step into the breach and endeavor to check it. The executive branch of the Government has chosen to take the course of endeavoring to check the liquidation. It is now squarely up to the Congress to make the last and final decree as to whether the liquidation shall go on or use the full power of the Government of the United States to endeavor to check the liquidation. This is a choice between two evils; it is the choice between two very expensive burdens. Probably no man knows which of these evils is the lesser and which of these burdens is the lighter.

If the liquidation goes on it would seem that general bankruptcy of the financial and industrial world is inevitable.

If the liquidation goes on, it simply means forcing the financial and industrial world down to the present bankrupt level of agriculture and other raw products. The standard of agriculture is about 40 per cent below the pre-war standard. Liquidation means tearing down the industrial and financial world to 40 per cent below the pre-war level. That means wholesale cutting and slashing of wages, increased unemployment, and other human misery in untold proportions. Maybe that is the way out of it; it is an awful price to pay, but sooner or later there must be a parity between the prices of raw products of the mine and of the farm and the prices of the products of industry. It is to be hoped that a checking of the liquidation will bring these raw products up to some sort of a parity with industry rather than dragging industry and finance down to the present low level of agriculture and mining.

If the liquidation goes on, agriculture is not going to be in any worse shape than it is now. The farms of the Nation will be sold when the mortgages are foreclosed; however, the farmers will buy their land back for less than the mortgage. So, after all, it is the financial world which is going into complete bankruptcy rather than agriculture. If the liquidation goes on, the farmers will lose their farm machinery for the mortgage debt, but they will buy it back for less than the mortgage. If the liquidation goes on, the millions of people engaged in agriculture and mining are not going to buy the products of industry until these industrial products are down to an exchange value with the prices of farm and mineral products. Agriculture and mining are as low as they can get. There is no way for the manufacturing industry and finance to go other than down to agriculture and mining unless the liquidation is stopped. I do not undertake even to so much as suggest that I know whether or not the President's program or any other program can check the liquidation which is coming about by the downward plunge of finance and industry to the 40 per cent below the pre-war level of agriculture and mining.

We should not be in this present situation if from 1919 to 1929 industry and finance had exercised a fair, decent, and equitable regard for the raw products of the farm and of the mine. However, that is water over the dam and the day of reckoning has come. Industry and finance are learning from bitter experience that "the mills of the gods grind slowly but exceedingly fine."

If the liquidation can be checked, the President's plan should check it. I do not believe that the Government is going to be able to do it with any $2,000,000,000. I should sooner think that in the end it will be nearer $10,000,000,000. Industry and finance must pay the bill. They must either pay it as they are now paying it, through the inescapable demand of the economic law to liquidate, or pay it through taxes necessary to pay the expenses of the Government in its effort to check the liquidation. There is no right way, in the sense of an easy way, out of this depression. It is the case of getting out of it the best that we can.

Hope springs eternal in the human breast.

I do not firmly believe, I only hope, that the President's program, if accepted by the Congress, will check the cruel liquidation. I can not say that wisdom and judgment prompt this hope. It may only be a vain human struggle to avoid the human suffering which will be the inevitable consequence of a continuation of the present liquidation under the economic law. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois what his plans are?

Mr. RAINEY. My purpose is to move that the committee rise in one minute from now.

Mr. PURNELL. And general debate will continue tomorrow?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CROWE].

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, much has been said concerning the state of the Union, its condition and of world-wide conditions.

World-wide conditions are a matter of concern always to us all. We are much nearer our European neighbors than we formerly were, with our fast-sailing ocean liners, our airplanes, dirigibles, our cables, our wireless. These tend to bring countries that were once far away now very near at hand. We are our brother's keeper to be sure, and we want to lend every possible aid and assistance to the nations of Europe that we can in justice to ourselves and our own people.

On June 20 last I was interviewed by the press as to whether I would support a 1-year moratorium on world intergovernmental debts. I answered through the press as follows:

I desire to support President Hoover, but I would not favor any moratorium whatever until the needs of our own people have been taken care of. I would not favor any measure that would in any manner or way tend to the cancellation of any debts of the European powers.

If one year's moratorium could be granted and our rights entirely safeguarded and if it were conclusively shown that it would be used to help and strengthen busines conditions and not result in a wedge to their later obtaining further concessions and cancellation of any part or parts of the debts of foreign countries, I am inclined to think that I would favor it. However, I want to see our own people cared for first.

I would favor any reasonable policy that would give the European powers a breathing spell if it were not permitted to be used in building up armaments. If they could be safely bound, then and only then would I favor assisting them.

On June 23 President Hoover wired me asking if I would support his moratorium proposal. I at once answered him as follows:

I favor action by the United States which will prevent the collapse of the German Republic. I favor your plan, Mr. President, suspending payments of war debts to us from France, England, Germany, Italy, Belgium, and other nations if such action will help economic conditions in those countries and in the United States, on the following conditions:

First. The tax burden upon our own people should not be increased by such moratorium.

Second. We should be assured that such action will, in some measure, tend to relieve our own economic distress and unemployment.

Third. We should know that such action will strengthen the position of the United States in the coming disarmament conference.

Fourth. Foreign countries should guarantee to the United States that they will not take advantage of the situation by way of increased expenditures for armament.

Fifth. Our own people should be assured that such action on our part is not an opening wedge leading to the cancellation of war debts to the United States.

Sixth. The Government of the United States should assure our own people that the loss of income from debt payment for the coming year will not interfere with relief needed by our own citizens and should guarantee that, in this land of plenty and surplus food, no one shall starve or suffer from prolonged hunger.

While we desire to help and aid Europe, we shall not overlook the terrible conditions staring us in the face here at home.

Furthermore, how far can we and should we be expected to go with Europe, and have we not already gone quite far enough?

Should we be required to extend the moratorium to other European countries in order to assist Germany? Could we not extend a helping hand to Germany and assist her in her crisis temporarily, if need be, and yet require the other nations to continue paying us?

Will the moratorium not be a wedge tending to further reparations reductions and ultimate cancellation?

To aid Germany, why was it necessary to suspend the payments due us from France, England, Italy, and other nations? Why was it necessary to suspend payments due us from Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Finland, Hungary, Lithuania, Latvia, Poland, and Yugoslavia? They are not indebted for war-time advances but loans were made them after the termination of the war and for other than war purposes. The loans of those eight nations total more than $400,000,000. On these, as well as other European debtors, the plan of their settlement does not even provide for a reasonable return on the money, they to pay only 3.2 per cent per annum.

UNITED STATES TO LOSE PRINCIPAL

Under the plan of this settlement we do not expect, neither can we hope, to ever be paid the principal, these countries to pay 3.2 per cent per annum for 62 years; then the debt is canceled.

What excuse or reason is there for a moratorium for these countries, and why give them additional time, when our farmers, our merchants, our workingmen are being ground to dust trying to raise the money to pay taxes, a part of which is to go to pay the interest on money loaned Europe?

In the case of France, after our boys returned, excepting the fallen heroes who rested in Flanders fields and other parts of France and Europe, there remained some $2,000,000,000 worth of supplies, railroad-equipment improvements we had made, foods of all kinds, and other supplies. Unfortunately, on account of our agreement respecting tariff duties, we only had one customer for all this, namely, France. She drove a bargain and purchased the $2,000,000,000 with promises to pay of $400,000,000, or 20 cents on the dollar. Prior to the armistice France, when hard pressed, secured loans from us of approximately $2,662,000,000. After the war was all over, listening to her further pleadings, we loaned France additional money until her total debt was $4,231,000,000. This total is generally considered and probably was under the amount really owed us by France. However, it was the figure arrived at.

This money was raised in the United States by sale of Liberty loan bonds, thrift stamps, and so forth, on which our Government pays the investors 4 per cent in the main, and when due they are to be retired by the owner receiving face value for them. We received in turn from France her promise to pay us 2½ per cent per annum for 62 years, at which time, instead of her paying off her obligations, the debt will be canceled.

Other European nations settled on terms most advantageous to them and to our great loss and disadvantage.

On the state of the Union, we had a deficit of some $900,000,000 last year, and it promises to be near $2,000,000,000 this year.

The amounts due us from Europe per year, according to settlements made with European powers, would be something over $300,000,000 per year. That money is needed to assist our own people, to help them carry some of their heavy load.

If the nations of Europe, other than Germany, are hard hit, let them forego the building of armaments and reduce their armies and navies. France, with her tremendous army, navy, and air corps, is paying nearly $2,500,000,000 yearly; that in two years would wipe out their debt to the United States. We have gone quite too far already in aiding Europe. Charity begins at home.

He that careth not for his own house hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel.

So reads the Good Book. If we are prepared to help, let us help our own countrymen.

While I am unalterably opposed to a dole, or a near approach to it, I oppose it when given to Europe, in moratorium and cancellation of debts, just the same and just as vigorously as I do to our own people, but at that we can not let our own people starve in this land of plenty.

If we can give so much aid to Europe, why not aid our own farmers, who are breaking under loads of debt and interest charges partly brought about by high taxation? I would prefer to extend a moratorium to our farmers and others who are under mortgage and losing their farms and homes.

VETERANS

If we are in position to offer help so generously to Europe, I ask instead that we give more careful consideration to the needs of our veterans. I shall introduce bills in Congress and try to get them written into legislation to be of benefit and help to the veterans and their dependents.

I may vote for the ratification of the 1-year moratorium as sponsored by President Hoover, but I am unalterably opposed to any further extension of time and shall never consent to any further reduction of reparations payments.

I am opposed to even any further discussion with European powers concerning reparations.

While the settlements we have made with the powers of Europe are not satisfactory they are no doubt much more satisfactory than any new settlements we would make.

I have too much respect for the fathers and mothers in the United States who bought Liberty bonds, and of their sons who offered their lives as a sacrifice for their country, to vote for any further extension of the moratorium or any cancellation whatever of European debts due us. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I intended to ask that these letters I hold in my hand be read from the desk this morning, but it was not possible to do that. I ask unanimous consent that I may insert them in the RECORD at this point following the remarks I have made. They constitute correspondence between the Under Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of State, and myself, pertaining to the moratorium and the war-debt situation.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letters referred to are as follows:

DECEMBER 12, 1931.

Hon. OGDEN L. MILLS,
Under Secretary of the Treasury, Treasury Department, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MILLS: The Washington Post this morning carries the following:

"MILLS TO MEET SENATORS

"Ogden L. Mills, Under Secretary of the Treasury, will go to the Capitol this morning to discuss the Hoover 1-year moratorium on war debts with five influential Senators.

"'I am going to talk about the December 15 payments and nothing else,' Mr. Mills said last night.

"He was referring to the payments which certain European countries were scheduled to make to this country next Tuesday, but which, under the Hoover moratorium, would be postponed and paid later over a 10-year period.

"It is now evident that Congress can not adopt the moratorium resolution until after Tuesday. Thus it becomes necessary for Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of State, to issue a statement explaining to the debtor nations that they are not expected to make the December 15 payments.

"Mr. Mills wants to consult the Senators about the form this statement should take.

"Mr. Mills, who is regarded as the President's principal adviser with respect to the international economic situation, will meet with the group of Senators this morning in the office of Majority Leader WATSON."

I desire to call your attention to the fact that the Secretary of State has no authority whatsoever to issue a statement to any debtors of the United States affected by the Hoover moratorium that they need not make payment of debts due the United States on December 15, 1931, pending action on the moratorium which is now before the Congress.

The Hoover moratorium was negotiated by the President of the United States without the authority of Congress, and now certainly the Secretary of State has no authority, and if he takes such action as indicated by you it will be a reversal of his position taken in July, 1929, when the Government of France asked for a short delay before executing the Mellon-Berenger agreement, wherein his position then was stated to France to be that the disposition established by the Mellon-Berenger accord could not be modified save by a law enacted by Congress, and he further stated that Congress was not in session and that the United States held the French documents of indebtedness and would proceed to an execution upon France if the Mellon-Berenger accord were not modified immediately.

Under my responsibility as a Member of Congress, I challenge the right of the Secretary of State to issue such a communication.

Very truly yours,

L. T. MCFADDEN.

DECEMBER 12, 1931.

Hon. HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: This morning's Washington Post carries the following article:

"MILLS TO MEET SENATORS

"Ogden L. Mills, Under Secretary of the Treasury, will go to the Capitol this morning to discuss the Hoover 1-year moratorium on war debts with five influential Senators.

"'I am going to talk about the December 15 payments and nothing else,' Mr. Mills said last night.

"It is now evident that Congress can not adopt the moratorium resolution until after Tuesday. Thus it becomes necessary for Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of State, to issue a statement explaining to the debtor nations that they are not expected to make the December 15 payments.

"Mr. Mills, who is regarded as the President's principal adviser with respect to the international economic situation, will meet with the group of Senators this morning in the office of Majority Leader WATSON."

I am inclosing copy of letter that I have this day sent to the Under Secretary, and now call it to your attention, and desire to be informed immediately as to whether or not you have issued such a letter to the creditors of the United States or whether you have in contemplation such action.

Under my responsibility as a Member of Congress, I challenge your right to issue such a communication.

Very truly yours,

L. T. MCFADDEN.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, December 12, 1931.

Hon. LOUIS T. MCFADDEN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MCFADDEN: I have your letter of December 12, which presumably was written before you talked to me over the telephone. Let me repeat what I said to you then: I never stated that the Secretary of State would issue a statement to the effect that our debtor nations are not expected to make the December 15 payments. To my knowledge neither the Secretary of State nor any other responsible officer of the Government has any intention of making any such statement.

Since you quote from the Washington Post of this morning, may I call your attention to the fact that the Washington Post does not say that I made any such statement. It quotes me as follows: "I am going to talk about the December 15 payments and nothing else."

Yours truly,

OGDEN L. MILLS,
Under Secretary of the Treasury.

DECEMBER 14, 1931.

Hon. OGDEN L. MILLS,
Under Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MILLS: I received your letter of the 12th replying to mine of the same date, which communication was written before I talked to you over the telephone. But, notwithstanding your denial over the telephone, after advice that I received that you had been discussing with Representatives GARNER, RAINEY, LINTHICUM, and COLLIER, SNELL, and HAWLEY, the very subject that you denied to me, and being further reassured by newspaper correspondents who were present at some of these interviews, I mailed you my letter. And now you have acknowledged in your interview printed in this morning's press that you did secretly try to get congressional approval by discussing not only with the above Members of the House, but with Senators WATSON, BORAH, REED, and others.

I now desire to reiterate what I said in my last letter to you and emphasize, so far as I am able, the fact that you are now attempting to do, by acquiescence and indirectly, what you know and what you have told me you have no right to do. I again repeat to you that you and those associated with you in this undertaking have no legal authority to do what you are doing, and you are laying yourselves personally liable to the people of the United States for any losses which they may incur by your assurance either directly to the debtor nations or to their legally constituted representatives.

The article in which you are quoted this morning says that the flurry of opposition to the President's moratorium is expected to die down as soon as Congress has learned that no connection is intended between the 12 months' debt holiday and the re-creation of the World War Foreign Debt Commission. You are directly quoted as saying, "There has never at any time been any intention of coupling the President's proposal to re-create the World War Foreign Debt Commission with the proposal for a 1-year suspension of payments on foreign debts." You know perfectly well that this statement is intended to deceive the Congress. You know how utterly impossible this would be. If this moratorium is ratified, war debts and reparations are irrevocably mixed. And you must know this when the present international bankers committee and the committee operating under the Bank for International Settlements are acting to ascertain Germany's capacity to pay, not only reparations but indebtedness of Germany, both short and long time, and that there is to be convened an international conference to deal with the question of the reduction of war debts and reparations. So why try to deceive Congress and the American people in regard to this vital matter at this time?

You are to appear before the Ways and Means Committee tomorrow to present your argument as regards the moratorium proposal. I hope at this meeting that you will not only include what you have prepared to say to this committee but that you will furnish to this committee the information which I have been asking for from the Secretary of the Treasury as per the inclosed copy of letter, and which information has not been forthcoming, but also furnish the information which I have been asking the Federal Reserve Board to produce as per the inclosed letter and which they have failed to produce. This information is vital in connection with the consideration which Congress is to give to this moratorium.

Very truly yours,

L. T. MCFADDEN.

DECEMBER 14, 1931.

Hon. HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have had no reply from you to my letter of December 12.

Supplementing what I said to you then, I desire to quote from this morning's Washington Post covering an announcement yesterday by Under Secretary of the Treasury Ogden L. Mills, as follows:

"The flurry of opposition to the President's moratorium is expected to die down as soon as Congress has learned that no connection is intended between the 12 months' debt holiday and the re-creation of the World War Foreign Debt Commission. This was emphatically declared by Mr. Mills yesterday. He said:

"'There has never at any time been any intention of coupling the President's proposal to re-create the World War Foreign Debt Commission with the proposal for a 1-year suspension of payments on foreign debts.'"

Under my responsibility as a Member of Congress, I again challenge your right to make any modifying statement to the debtors of the United States affected by the Hoover moratorium whose payments are due to-morrow and who will, I understand, if you do not deprive them of the opportunity, pay into the United States Treasury approximately $125,000,000.

I protest that you have no right whatsoever to mislead the representatives here of the countries affected. This debt settlement agreement can not be modified without the approval of Congress; you have no authority until Congress gives it to you in this instance. I desire to point out to you that the acquiescence of a small number of Representatives and Senators is not the approval of Congress. Congress is now in session and is dealing with the subject.

I desire to now notify you that you and all of those associated with you in this attempt to deprive the United States of what is legally due them from these countries will be held personally responsible, and I demand that you advise me what communications or verbal assurances or acquiescences have been directly given to the debtor countries or their legal representatives here or elsewhere.

Very truly yours,

L. T. MCFADDEN.

NOVEMBER 21, 1931.

Hon. ANDREW W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MELLON: In connection with the consideration that will be given in the coming session of Congress relative to the Hoover moratorium of war debts and reparation payments, I shall be pleased if you will advise me at once full information relative to Germany's debt, both short and long term, and to what countries and banks they are owed, and the amounts; and, also, if you will furnish we a complete statement of all war debts and reparations involved in this moratorium. I am particularly anxious that this statement shall cover the short-term indebtedness, which by agreement among American and foreign bankers has been extended to February, 1932, and any other amount of short-term indebtedness which may not have been covered by this agreement.

I am particularly anxious to know, also, the amount of short-term indebtedness represented by acceptances or notes made in other countries indorsed or guaranteed by the German Government, or German States or financial institutions, and to what amount, if any, such obligations are held in the United States, and by whom.

In other words, I am asking you for full and complete information relative to the financial situation of Germany as affected by this moratorium, and I would also like you to include, if possible, the entire debt which the German Government or her States and political subdivisions or her people owe to this country or any other country. Your prompt attention to this will oblige.

Respectfully yours,

L. T. MCFADDEN.

NOVEMBER 23, 1931.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: In connection with the consideration that will be given by the coming session of Congress to the Hoover moratorium, I shall be pleased if you will advise me the total amount and character of all short-term German indebtedness which is now in the United States and by whom held and the amounts. I should like this to include not only direct borrowings between banks, banking or acceptance houses on the part of the Germans or any of their institutions but also any obligations indorsed or otherwise guaranteed by the German Government or any company or banking institution or individuals in or outside of Germany—in other words, to show the entire situation of German short-term indebtedness, together with any agreements as to extension or payments, or any acceptances or other obligations now held by Federal reserve banks taken through any foreign acceptance house or banks.

I should also like to have particularly identified a list of the names of the holders, and the amounts held by each, of the short-term indebtedness in the United States covered by the American and English extension agreement which runs until February, 1932.

I should also like a statement of all loans or credits established by the 12 Federal reserve banks to other central banks or the Bank for International Settlements, and the character of such loans or credits and in each instance how secured, and the total itemized amounts now unpaid.

Also, please advise me what commitments on the part of the Federal reserve banks or the Federal Reserve Board are outstanding relating to loans, credits, or gold; also, whether or not any agreement or understanding exists at the present time with any of the central banks or their governments, including the Bank for International Settlements, in regard to changes of discount rates or gold movements.

I should also like to be informed as to what amount, if any, of the so-called short-term German, English, or Russian acceptances were held at the time of the moratorium, or are now held by any of the 12 Federal reserve banks and the amount so held by each bank, and please state whether such banks procured these acceptances by direct purchase or through rediscount for member banks.

Also, please advise the amount of money the Federal reserve banks now have on deposit with the Bank for International Settlements and what amount, if any, of paper the Federal reserve now holds taken from the Bank for International Settlements, or any other agreements upon which the Federal reserve banks are bound in any manner whatsoever.

If any amount of these German, English, or Russian acceptances were, on the date of the moratorium, or are now, held by the Federal reserve banks, what amounts of each are held by any of the Federal reserve agents as security for outstanding Federal reserve notes?

Very truly yours,

L. T. MCFADDEN.

NOVEMBER 30, 1931.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: In connection with the consideration that is about to be given to the Hoover moratorium I desire you to advise me what amount of short-term indebtedness, acceptances or otherwise, is held by the 12 Federal reserve banks or member banks originating or in any way guaranteed or issued by Austria or any of her institutions, thus enabling me to know the amount of short-term Austrian debts held in the United States.

Awaiting your reply, I remain, sincerely yours,

L. T. MCFADDEN.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LOZIER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the President's message and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the special committee on the District of Columbia are filing their report to-day or to-morrow. They would like to have a little time to explain the report to the House before it is taken up in the House. If it is agreeable to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], I wish we could arrange to give them from 40 to 60 minutes to-morrow.

Mr. RAINEY. That would be entirely satisfactory. At what time?

Mr. SNELL. I think perhaps the first thing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not seen that report, but he is under the impression that it would be a matter to be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SNELL. They want to make an explanation of the resolution they are going to introduce in advance of its introduction.

Mr. RAINEY. And not consider the report?

Mr. SNELL. No.

SIXTEENTH SESSION, INTERNATIONAL GEOLOGICAL CONGRESS

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

I commend to the favorable consideration of the Congress the inclosed report from the Secretary of State, to the end that legislation may be enacted to authorize an appropriation of $85,000 for the expenses of the Sixteenth Session of the International Geological Congress to be held in the United States in 1933.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, December 14, 1931.

SUPREME COURT, PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith two related bills enacted by the Eighth Philippine Legislature during its second session and approved by the Governor General of the Philippine Islands. They are:

S. No. 261. "An act defining the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands, creating a court of appeals and defining its jurisdiction, and providing for other purposes"; and

S. No. 155. "An act concerning the judiciary; making provision regarding the court of appeals created by act entitled 'An act defining the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands, creating a court of appeals and defining its jurisdiction, and for other purposes'; providing appropriation for said court of appeals; applying the provisions of certain sections of the revised administrative code to said court of appeals, and for other purposes."

Briefly, the purpose of the two acts was to relieve congestion in the work of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands by the creation of an intermediate court of appeals between the Courts of First Instance and the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands.

Act S. No. 261 purports to diminish the present jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands through transfer of certain of that jurisdiction to the proposed court of appeals. Under section 26 of the organic act of the Philippine Islands the act can not take effect without the prior approval of Congress.

The related act, S. No. 155, provides for the organization of the proposed court of appeals if and when authorized by Congress. It contemplated no express approval by Congress of its provisions.

The acts in question are transmitted as indicative of the form and substance of legislation which at the time of the passage of the acts by the Philippine Legislature was deemed advisable by that body. Subsequent, however, to the passage of these acts the Philippine Legislature passed legislation relative to the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands, which received the approval of the Governor General and which does not require action by the Congress. That legislation (Act No. 3816, December 8, 1930) authorized an increase in the personnel of the supreme court, the jurisdiction of the court remaining unchanged.

It is believed that existing legislation affords adequate provision for meeting present needs. It is accordingly recommended that neither Act S. No. 261 nor Act S. No. 155 receive the approval of Congress.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 14, 1931.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Tuesday, December 15, 1931, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

245. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a draft of a bill to provide appropriate military records for persons who, pursuant to orders, reported for military duty but whose induction into the service was, through no fault of their own, not formally completed on or prior to November 30, 1918; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

257. A letter from the Librarian of Congress, transmitting annual report as Librarian of Congress, together with that of the Register of Copyrights, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1931; to the Committee on the Library.

258. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on Skunk River, Iowa, covering navigation, power development, and irrigation; and also its effects upon the lower Mississippi River with regard to flood control (H. Doc. No. 170); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

259. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on the Chippewa River, Wis., covering navigation, flood control, power development, and irrigation (H. Doc. No. 171); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

260. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on preliminary examination of Bayou Yscloskey (Ysclosky), La.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

261. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on preliminary examination and survey of Lake Charles Deep Water Channel, La., with a view to maintaining said channel to its enlarged dimensions and to reporting the amount of contributions in land and money heretofore furnished by local interests for such waterway (H. Doc. No. 172); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

262. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on preliminary examination of channel from Palacios, Tex., and the Texas National Guard Camp through Tres Palacios and Matagorda Bays to a connection with the Intracoastal Waterway; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

263. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on preliminary examination of the Combahee and Big Salkehatchie Rivers, S. C.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

264. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on preliminary examination of Pithlachascotee River, Fla.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1931

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Father of all mercies, who hast brought us to this hour of serving Thee, we bless and magnify Thy glorious name for all the gracious gifts of Thy bestowal as day by day Thy gentle breath revives for us life's grace and beauty. We thank Thee for the sanctities of home, for those whose love is as a quiet sanctuary of the soul when the ills of life oppress us, for those whose need and sorrow evoke our tender sympathy, our worthiest compassion. Give us, therefore, an understanding heart to discern Thy will, a noble courage to fulfill it, and, crowning all, a joy in service that shall inspire this Nation with a sure and steadfast purpose which shall dissipate all clouds of gloom and fear and point the way once more to our eternal destiny. We ask it in the name of Him who is the desire of nations, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. MCNARY and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE COMPTROLLER OF CURRENCY

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Comptroller of the Currency, transmitting, pursuant to law, his annual report covering the activities of the Currency Bureau for the year ended October 31, 1931, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution of the Legislature of Rhode Island, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND AND PROVIDENCE PLANTATIONS,
IN GENERAL ASSEMBLY,
JANUARY SESSION, A. D. 1931.

Resolution recommending to the Congress of the United States the passage of legislation providing for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States

Whereas in the year 1637 Roger Williams, the founder of this State, dedicated a Commonwealth to the great idea of liberty and law, and for the first time saw that great idea take an organic form in a civil community and become expressed in a social compact; and

Whereas it has been the fortune of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, from her first settlement to the present hour, to balance herself between liberty and law and to wage war as occasion might require against those who sought to encroach upon her liberty or those who denied her right of self-government in accordance with her ancient law; and

Whereas in assertion of her right to liberty the general assembly of this State on May 4, 1776, with but six dissenting votes, declared her independence of Great Britain, thus anticipating by two months the Declaration of Independence, and thus daring to stand against tyranny even though, like her great founder, she stood alone; and

Whereas the people of this State have always insisted, and do still insist, that the liberty of a State to control the conduct of its citizens is the most precious possession of a democracy, and that the solution of local problems can come only from experience within the State and can never come from intervention from without; and

Whereas in the course of her history the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations attempted to enforce prohibition by law upon her people, and in the year 1886 the legislature of this State voted to submit to the people the following amendment to the constitution of the State:

"The manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors to be used as a beverage shall be prohibited," this amendment being approved by the people in April, 1887, by a vote of 15,113 to 9,230; and

Whereas so numerous were the violations of this prohibitory law, so general was the defiance of the law by the citizens of this State, so great were the evils which accompanied this prohibitory method, that in January, 1889, the assembly voted that the previous prohibitory amendment should be annulled, and in June the people concurred in their opinion by a vote of 28,315 to 9,956; and

Whereas when the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States was proposed to the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations this State, mindful of its disastrous experience and failure in the effort of this State to enforce prohibition by law and conscious that this amendment was an encroachment by the Federal Government upon the State sovereignty which was the chief concern of those who framed the Constitution, directed its attorney general to test the legality of this amendment as adopted by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States; and

Whereas the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations has always refused and does still refuse to ratify and adopt the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States; and

Whereas the qualified electors of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations at the election held November 4, 1930, by a vote of 171,960 to 47,652 declared against the further retention of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations does hereby express the will of the people of Rhode Island and of this general assembly that the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution should be repealed, because said amendment is contrary to the purpose and spirit of the Constitution, debasing our fundamental code of political rights and duties by the addition of a legislative fiat of a purely sumptuary nature; because said amendment, which has so greatly abridged and affected the rights and habits of the people of the United States, was not approved by the people of the United States, or by conventions called by the people of the various States, or by legislatures of the various States elected to vote upon such amendment; because said amendment seeks to enforce prohibition by law rather than to promote temperance by education and self-discipline and attempts an experiment never successful in any country at any time; because said amendment is designed to prevent the personal use of intoxicating liquor, no matter how moderate such use may be, and thereby incurs the resentment of millions of our people who see nothing criminal or immoral in such use; because said amendment and the Volstead Act place the restraining hand of law upon practices that are at most only of doubtful character and sacrifice the wholesome distinctions which for centuries have separated debatable habit from indisputable crime, enact penalties so utterly disproportionate to the offense that they offend the universal sense of justice and thus can not only never be enforced but rather will always be either cunningly evaded or contemptuously ignored; that said amendment and the Volstead Act, running counter to public opinion in certain States, have inspired neither respect for their justice nor fear of their enforcement and because of such lack of respect or fear have resulted in a Saturnalia of crime and corruption fatally injurious to government and morals; and because such amendment creates an irrepressible issue now dividing and destined to further divide the States of our Union to the detriment of national unity, progress, and strength; and be it further

Resolved, That the Representatives and Senators in Congress from Rhode Island be instructed to initiate, work, and vote for legislation requiring Congress to call a convention under Article V of the Constitution of the United States for the purpose of proposing an amendment or amendments to the Constitution amending, modifying, revising, or repealing Article XVIII; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Rhode Island be, and he is hereby, directed to forward copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, to the Vice President of the United States, to the Members of the United States Senate, and to the Members of the House of Representatives 10 days before the convening of the Seventy-second Congress.

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND AND
PROVIDENCE PLANTATIONS,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Providence, March 23, 1931.

I hereby certify the foregoing to be a true copy of the original (H. 805) resolution recommending to the Congress of the United States the passage of legislation providing for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States passed by the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations and approved by the governor on the 21st day of March, A. D. 1931.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the State aforesaid this 23d day of March, A. D. 1931.

[SEAL.] ERNEST L. SPRAGUE,
Secretary of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of Illinois, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

I, William J. Stratton, secretary of state of the State of Illinois, do hereby certify that the following and hereto attached is a true photostatic copy of Senate Joint Resolution No. 23, the original of which is now on file and a matter of record in this office.

In testimony whereof I hereto set my hand and cause to be affixed the great seal of the State of Illinois. Done at the city of Springfield this 12th day of August, A. D. 1931.

[SEAL.] WILLIAM J. STRATTON,
Secretary of State.

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
FIFTY-SEVENTH GENERAL ASSEMBLY, 1931,
SENATE.

Senate Joint Resolution 23

Whereas Gen. John J. Pershing was born at Laclede, in Lynn County, Mo., and spent his boyhood days and grew to manhood there; and

Whereas there is a widespread sentiment to promote and influence the location of a national military park at Laclede to perpetuate the name and memory of General Pershing: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Fifty-seventh General Assembly of the State of Illinois (the House of Representatives concurring herein), That the Seventy-second Congress of the United States be respectfully requested to enact necessary laws establishing a national military park at Laclede, Mo., in honor of General Pershing; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this preamble and resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the Vice President, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Seventy-second Congress, and to each Member of the Senate and House of Representatives of the Seventy-second Congress from the State of Illinois.

Adopted by the senate June 18, 1931.

FRED E. STERLING,
President of the Senate.
J. H. PADDOCK,
Secretary of the Senate.

Concurred in by the house of representatives June 19, 1931.

DAVID E. SHANAHAN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
GEORGE C. BLAMER,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, which were referred to the Committee on Finance:

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

I, William J. Stratton, secretary of state of the State of Illinois, do hereby certify that the following and hereto attached is a true photostatic copy of Senate Joint Resolution No. 3, the original of which is now on file and a matter of record in this office.

In testimony whereof I hereto set my hand and cause to be affixed the great seal of the State of Illinois.

FIFTY-SEVENTH GENERAL ASSEMBLY, 1931,
SENATE.

Senate Joint Resolution 3

Whereas the young manhood of this country immediately responded to the call of our Government in doing its great work in the late World War, and in the face of death performed such valiant and heroic service as to bring credit to themselves and crown the American arms with glory and victory; and

Whereas these loyal and brave men, in making this world safe for democracy, gave up the benefits of home life and the opportunities of financial gain and now are in large numbers unemployed and in destitute circumstances; and

Whereas legislation is now pending in Congress to provide for the cash payment to veterans of the World War of the cash surrender value of their adjusted-compensation certificates issued under the World War adjusted compensation act; and

Whereas fairness and justice demand that our Government come to the aid of these veterans of the World War in their present distress: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Fifty-seventh General Assembly of the State of Illinois (the House of Representatives concurring herein), That the President of the United States and the Senate and House of Representatives of the present Congress be memorialized to enact legislation to provide for the immediate cash payment to veterans of the World War of the cash surrender value of their adjusted-compensation certificates issued under the World War adjusted compensation act; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this preamble and resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the present Congress, and to each Senator and Representative therein from the State of Illinois.

Adopted by the senate January 27, 1931.

FRED E. STERLING,
President of the Senate,
J. H. PADDOCK,
Secretary of the Senate.

Concurred in by the house of representatives January 28, 1931.

GEO. C. BLAEUER,
Clerk of the House.

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

I, William J. Stratton, secretary of state of the State of Illinois, do hereby certify that the following and hereto attached is a true photostatic copy of House Joint Resolution No. 55, the original of which is now on file and a matter of record in this office.

In testimony whereof I hereto set my hand and cause to be affixed the great seal of the State of Illinois. Done at the city of Springfield this 12th day of August, A. D. 1931.

[SEAL.] WILLIAM J. STRATTON,

House Joint Resolution 55

Whereas in a recent radio address William Randolph Hearst, addressing himself to the American people, advocated that the Congress of the United States authorize the issuance of a $5,000,000,000 bond issue for the purpose of speeding up public works, with a view of relieving the present unsatisfactory economic condition of the country, particularly pointing out that such act would furnish employment to numberless citizens who are now out of work; and

Whereas the suggestion made by Mr. Hearst is the first concrete plan offered by any outstanding American to relieve the unemployment problem and thus bring about a return of prosperity in all lines of industrial activity and improvement in agricultural conditions; and

Whereas the feasibility of the Hearst plan has been demonstrated by the $6,000,000,000 oversubscription of last week's Government bond issue: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois (the Senate concurring herein), That the Legislature of Illinois does hereby indorse the suggestion and plan of William Randolph Hearst that Congress float a $5,000,000,000 prosperity loan and enact the necessary legislation which will provide for the inauguration of a nation-wide building program of public works and internal improvements; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States and to the officers of both Houses of the Congress of the United States.

Adopted by the house June 10, 1931.

DAVID E. SHANAHAN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
GEORGE C. BLAEUER,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Concurred in by the senate June 11, 1931.

President of the Senate.
JAMES H. PODDOE,
Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. CAREY presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of Wyoming, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

THE STATE OF WYOMING,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Wyoming, ss:

I, A. M. Clark, secretary of state of the State of Wyoming, do hereby certify that the annexed is a full, true, and correct copy of original Senate Joint Resolution 1 as passed by the Twenty-first Legislature of the State of Wyoming, as approved March 3, 1931.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Wyoming.

Done at Cheyenne, the capital, this 4th day of March, A. D. 1931.

[SEAL.] A. M. CLARK,
Secretary of State.
By H. M. SYMOUR,
Deputy.

Enrolled Joint Resolution 1, requesting the President of the United States to negotiate a treaty with Canada providing for the construction of the Great-Lakes St. Lawrence seaway

Whereas it appears that the construction of the shipway from the Great Lakes to the sea is imperative for the future development of a vast area in the interior of the continent and that it has been estimated that the capital cost of the waterway and that the economic importance of the improvement would be far greater than the savings made upon the actual tonnage transported, important though that would be; and

Whereas the growth of the State of Wyoming, the development of her agricultural and mineral resources, her present prosperity, and her future welfare all demand permanent relief from the existing high transportation costs to and from the markets of the world, and require that freedom to enter into world commerce now denied by reason of her distance from the ocean, a situation resulting in a combined rail-and-ocean transportation cost prohibitive to many of her potential industries, and oppressive to those industries that now exist; and

Whereas the St. Lawrence seaway would give to the State of Wyoming a sea base more than a thousand miles nearer to her eastern border than at present, and by such removal would permanently lower her rail-and-ocean cost of transportation to and from world markets, would increase the demand for her agricultural products, would stimulate the development of her mineral wealth, would invite new enterprise, and generally would assure to her citizens an enlarged and abiding prosperity: Be it

Resolved, That the State of Wyoming in legislature assembled does most earnestly urge upon the President of the United States the imperative national need of such seaway, and that it does further express to him the desire of this State that immediate steps be taken for the negotiation of a treaty with Canada to that end, and that certified copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Wyoming.

CHARLES B. MANN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
CLARENCE GARDNER,
President of the Senate.

Acting Governor.

Mr. CAREY also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of Wyoming, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

I, A. M. Clark, secretary of state of the State of Wyoming, do hereby certify that the annexed is a full, true, and correct copy of original Senate Joint Memorial No. 3, as passed by the Twenty-first Legislature of the State of Wyoming, as approved March 3, 1931.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Wyoming.

Enrolled Joint Memorial No. 3, memorializing the Federal Farm Loan Board and the Federal Land Bank of Omaha to provide loans in reasonable amounts upon Wyoming farm lands and ranches

Whereas many owners of farm and ranch lands in Wyoming are in need of long-term loans, such as are provided for under the provisions of the Federal farm loan act, in order to finance their undertakings in a manner commensurate with their ability to pay; and

Whereas a reasonable program of financial assistance through Federal and State farm loans would afford a practical means of farm relief as now needed in support of agriculture; and

Whereas the Federal Farm Loan Board and the Federal Land Bank of Omaha were created by an act of Congress for the purpose of extending financial aid to agriculture; and

Whereas there is at the present time ample opportunity to extend further reasonable financial aid to agriculture in Wyoming and there is available a large amount of attractive security for money loaned in this State; and

Whereas during the years of 1928 and 1929 the Federal Land Bank of Omaha made loans upon farm lands and ranches in the State of Wyoming in the sum of only $264,000, which amount represents a material decrease from the amount of loans previously made in the said State; and

Whereas the said amount of loans made denotes a marked inactivity of the Federal Land Bank of Omaha as to loans in the State of Wyoming when compared to loans in the amount of $1,780,550 as made by the State of Wyoming, acting by and through the Wyoming Farm Loan Board for the years of 1928 and 1929; and

Whereas it would therefore appear that the Federal Land Bank of Omaha is not doing its reasonable share in the loaning of money within the State of Wyoming for assistance in the advancement of the agricultural interests of said State: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Twenty-first Legislature of the State of Wyoming (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Federal Farm Loan Board and the Federal Land Bank of Omaha be earnestly requested to again provide loans in reasonable amounts upon Wyoming farm lands and ranches for the purpose of further extending this practical form of aid to agriculture in this State; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be promptly forwarded by his excellency, the Governor of Wyoming, to the Federal Farm Board at Washington, D. C., the Federal Land Bank of Omaha at Omaha, Nebr., United States Senator JOHN B. KENDRICK, United States Senator ROBERT D. CAREY, and Hon. VINCENT CARTER, Representative in Congress, with the request that they make special effort to effectuate the objects of this memorial.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD presented a petition of sundry citizens of Ortonville, Minn., praying for the passage of legislation known as "the farmers' farm relief act," which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. BARBOUR presented a paper from Judge Richard Hartshorne, chairman of the New Jersey World Court committee, transmitting numerous resolutions adopted by clubs, societies, and sundry other organizations in the State of New Jersey, favoring ratification of the World Court protocols, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

THE PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I offer and ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter in the nature of a petition addressed to me by Mr. Wirt Franklin, president of the Independent Petroleum Association. I respectfully invite the attention of Senators to this letter. It is a very good answer to a certain editorial appearing in one of the Washington newspapers this morning.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TULSA, OKLA., December 11, 1931.

Senator SAMUEL M. SHORTRIDGE,
Senate Office Building.

DEAR SENATOR: Exercising the right of petition, guaranteed by the Constitution, the Independent Petroleum Association of America requests your careful consideration of the needs of the petroleum industry in this country, and what they believe is an imperative necessity for either proper tariff protection of this industry or some adequate restriction upon the importation of cheap foreign oil now entering our ports to the practical destruction of this American business.

It is utterly impossible for American petroleum producers to compete with the cheap foreign oil now being admitted duty free. Aside from higher labor costs, the American petroleum industry carried tremendous burdens of taxation in the various States and has an overhead from which the foreign oil producers are free. Continuation of free importation of foreign oil must mean the ultimate disappearance of the American independent producer, refiner, and marketer. We trust you will carefully consider the need of appropriate legislation for the following reasons, which we have endeavored to make as concise as clarity will permit:

The production of petroleum is one of the basic industries of this Nation. It would employ under normal conditions 2,000,000 people. Upon it, directly or indirectly, 22,000,000 people depend for their livelihood. These 22,000,000 constitute the mass of population of one-third of the area of this Nation.

The prostration of the independent oil industry has not merely reduced these 22,000,000 people to penury but has utterly wiped out the markets, worth many billions of dollars, normally provided by these millions for the industrial output of the manufacturing States. This has greatly increased the unemployment in those States.

The destruction of the purchasing power of the great oil States of the Nation has naturally reduced freight movements from manufacturing communities to these portions of the country, thus cutting railroad receipts, necessitating the lay-off of railroad workers, affecting dividends and stock values, and intensifying industrial unrest.

The farmers in the oil States have been receiving millions of dollars in lease bonuses and annual rental payments on actual or potential oil lands. This source of income has largely been cut off. It would be restored and greatly increased if the American producer could be assured of a fair field against his foreign rivals. In a number of the oil States two-thirds of the farmers should be receiving these annual payments. Proper protection for the oil industry would be one of the most effective methods of farm relief.

Our merchant marine would find almost immediate use for many ships now laid up which would be required for the coastwise transportation of the various products of petroleum. This would be a very practical cure for much of the unemployment of sailors and officers, since at least 14,000 officers and sailors, with an annual pay roll of $4,000,000, would be required to man the vessels required.

All the oil-producing States impose very heavy production taxes upon the oil industry. These taxes have been the most important element in many State budgets. Because of the decrease in production through the elimination of home markets for American petroleum and its products, many of these States face embarrassing deficits and will probably be forced to make a redistribution of taxes, with higher levies, to the demoralization of the business life of those commonwealths.

The Federal tax receipts from income taxes and taxes paid by corporations have been affected by the destruction of the independent petroleum industry, although the amount thus lost to the Federal Treasury can not be accurately ascertained at present.

The independent petroleum producers have exercised an unparalleled self-restraint in limiting production. They have supported the organized activity of the various States to make such limitation official. In 1930 they shut in 109,000,000 barrels of oil at the very time that 105,000,000 barrels of imported and refined products were taking our home markets. They have done all within their power to stabilize the industry. They believe that equivalent burdens should be placed upon the foreign oil which is now in unfair competition with our product. Any reference to the governmental figures will show that the American production of petroleum is much less than our consumption. We are surrendering to foreign competitors and to foreign labor markets which should be our own.

We sincerely believe that the return of prosperity and the early employment of most of those who are at present out of employment depends upon the restoration of the independent oil industry more than it does upon any other single factor. In this we find outstanding economists and industrialists concur.

Since we made our former request fields with tremendous output, such as the east Texas field, have been discovered. The total amount of petroleum in sight to-day is so vast that the fears which lay at the base of the former conservation program are now known to be unfounded. Our oil reserves are practically inexhaustible. It is within the realm of possibility that before we have approached their exhaustion the oil age will have passed and some synthetic fuel or other means of releasing energy will have been discovered. It is important for our national development that we shall utilize these petroleum resources before they become obsolete.

The arguments we have here merely indicated we developed at full length in the hearings held by the Senate Committee on Commerce and by the Ways and Means Committee of the House at the closing session of the last Congress. Reference to the published hearings will give not only our arguments but the only objections which were offered by those who at that time opposed the proper protection of the independent oil industry. We will be very glad indeed to furnish additional information to any Member of Congress who may desire it. We feel assured, however, that the justice of our cause is apparent to all and only regret that the forecasts of industrial depression which we uttered as warnings when it was evident that our earlier requests for protection would be refused have turned out to be accurate prophecies.

We trust that Congress will speedily remedy the present situation.

Very respectfully yours,

INDEPENDENT PETROLEUM ASSOCIATION,
WIRT FRANKLIN, President.

CLASSIFICATION, ETC., OF DATA SUBMITTED BY NATIONAL COMMISSION FOR LAW OBSERVANCE AND ENFORCEMENT

Mr. SHIPSTEAD, from the Committee on Printing, reported a resolution (S. Res 92), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Printing be, and is hereby, authorized to expend not to exceed $15,000, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, for the classification, arranging, compiling, and indexing of the documentary evidence, statistics, records, and other data submitted to the Senate by the National Commission for Law Observance and Enforcement in response to Senate Resolutions Nos. 423 and 463, and ordered printed as Senate Document No. 307, Seventy-first Congress, third session, under authority of Senate Resolution No. 474, reported to the Senate from the Committee on Printing on February 26, 1931, and agreed to; and for the employment of the necessary assistance in connection with the publication of all other matters authorized by the Senate during said session to be printed under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing.

ADMISSION TO THE UNITED STATES OF FOREIGN PARTICIPANTS IN OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. HATFIELD. From the Committee on Immigration I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 72) to permit the temporary entry into the United States, under certain conditions, of alien participants and officials of the Third Olympic Winter Games and of the games of the Tenth Olympiad to be held in the United States in 1932, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That alien participants, officials, and other accredited members of delegations to the Third Olympic Winter Games and to the games of the Tenth Olympiad to be held in the United States in 1932, and members of the immediate families and servants of the foregoing, all the foregoing who are nonimmigrants, if otherwise admissible into the United States under the immigration laws, shall be exempted from the payment of the tax of $8 prescribed by section 2 of the immigration act of 1917, and exempted from the fees prescribed under the law to be collected in connection with executing an application for a visa and visaing the passport or other travel document of an alien for the purpose of entering the United States as a nonimmigrant, and such aliens shall not be required to present official passports issued by the governments to which they owe allegiance: Provided, That such aliens shall be in possession of official Olympic games identity cards duly visaed without charge by American consular officers abroad: And provided further, That such aliens shall comply with regulations not inconsistent with the foregoing provisions which shall be prescribed by the Secretary of Labor and the Secretary of State: Provided, however, That nothing herein shall relieve an alien from being required to obtain a gratis nonimmigrant visa if coming to the United States as a nonimmigrant, or an immigration visa if coming to the United States as an immigrant: Be it further

Resolved, That such aliens shall be permitted the free entry of their personal effects and their equipment to be used in connection with the games, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Passed the House of Representatives December 10, 1931.

REGULATION OF CARRIERS BY WATER

Mr. JOHNSON. I introduce a bill heretofore prepared by the Shipping Board. I have not had the opportunity or time carefully to go through it, but I introduce it for reference to the Commerce Committee, with two letters that accompany it, and ask that they be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, December 12, 1931.

Hon. HIRAM W. JOHNSON,
Chairman Committee on Commerce,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: The United States Shipping Board in its fifteenth annual report to the Congress under the heading "Recommendations" submitted the following:

"Legislation should be enacted to provide for additional regulatory authority over common carriers by water. Particularly is such legislation needed as respects jurisdiction over minimum rates and as respects restriction of operation of common-carrier services by industries or by industrially owned or controlled organizations."

The Shipping Board on December 11, 1931, adopted the inclosed entitled "Shipping Act, 1932," as a tentative draft of proposed legislation in accord with the terms of the foregoing recommendation and directed its committee on legislation and ocean mail contracts to present the same to the Congress.

In accord with the vote of the Shipping Board, I have the honor to herewith submit a copy of said "Shipping Act, 1932," for such consideration as your committee, in its good judgment, sees fit to accord the same.

For your information I beg to advise that a copy of said "Shipping Act, 1932," will be submitted to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House as soon as its personnel is announced.

Respectfully,
COMMITTEE ON LEGISLATION AND OCEAN MAIL CONTRACTS,
By E. C. PLUMMER, Chairman.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, December 11, 1931.

Memorandum for committee on legislation and ocean mail contracts: Commissioner Plummer, Commissioner O'Connor, Commissioner Cone

The Shipping Board, at a meeting on December 11, 1931, considered your memorandum dated December 11, 1931, and draft of proposed legislation submitted therewith, copies of which are attached hereto, relative to shipping act, 1932, and directed the committee on legislation and ocean mail contracts to present the matter to the Congress as a tentative draft of proposed legislation in accord with the terms of the recommendation to the Congress made on page 10 of the fifteenth annual report of the United States Shipping Board.

The proper officers of the Shipping Board and/or Merchant Fleet Corporation were authorized and directed to take any and all actions necessary and proper to carry the action of the board as above set forth fully into effect.

SAMUEL GOODACRE, Secretary.

The bill (S. 1963) entitled "Shipping Act, 1932," amending the shipping act, 1916, as amended, for the purpose of further regulating carriers by water engaged in interstate and foreign commerce of the United States, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

S. 1963

Amending the shipping act, 1916, as amended, for the purpose of further regulating carriers by water engaged in interstate and foreign commerce of the United States, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

SECTION 1. That section 1 of the shipping act, 1916, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 1. When used in this act the term 'common carrier by water in foreign commerce' means a common carrier, except ferryboats running on regular routes, engaged in the transportation by water of passengers or property between the United States or any of its Districts, Territories, or possessions, and a foreign country.

"The term 'common carrier by water in interstate commerce,' as used in this act, means a common carrier, except ferryboats running on regular routes, engaged in the transportation by water of passengers or property between one State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States and any other State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States, or between places in the same Territory, District, or possession; and an intrastate common carrier by water participating in any such transportation under any through-route arrangement with any common carrier by water in interstate commerce as here defined shall, except as otherwise provided in this act, be deemed a common carrier by water in interstate commerce.

"The term 'possession,' as used in this act shall include the Philippine Islands and the Canal Zone: Provided, however, That nothing contained herein shall affect the authority of the Government of the Philippine Islands vested by the second proviso of section 21 of the merchant marine act, 1920, as amended.

"The term 'common carrier by water,' as used in this act, means a common carrier by water in foreign commerce or a common carrier by water in interstate commerce as above defined.

"The term 'other person subject to this act' means any person carrying on the business of forwarding or furnishing wharfage, dock, warehouse, or other terminal facilities in connection with a common carrier by water.

"The term 'person' as used in this act includes any individual, partnership, firm, corporation, company, or association, or any mercantile, agricultural, or manufacturing society, or other organization, or any body politic or municipal organization.

"The term 'vessel' includes any water craft or other artificial contrivance of whatever description and at whatever stage of construction, whether on the stocks or launched, which is used or is capable of being or is intended to be used as a means of transportation on water.

"The term 'documented under the laws of the United States' means registered, enrolled, or licensed under the laws of the United States."

SEC. 2. That the shipping act, 1916, as amended, is amended by the addition after section 1 of two new sections, as follows:

"SEC. 1A. From and after one year from date of enactment of the shipping act, 1932, it shall be unlawful for any common carrier by water in interstate commerce to transport any article or commodity manufactured, mined, or produced by, or under authority of, or owned in whole or in part by, such carrier, or by any person, directly or indirectly, controlling, managing, or operating such carrier, or in which such carrier or person may have any interest, direct or indirect: Provided, however, That nothing contained in this section shall apply to such articles or commodities as may be necessary and intended for the use of such carrier in the conduct of its business as a common carrier. Any common carrier by water in interstate commerce transporting any article or commodity contrary to the provisions of this section shall be punished by a fine of not less than $5,000 nor more than $10,000 for each offense, to be recovered by the United States in a civil action.

"SEC. 1B. Within 60 days after date of enactment of the shipping act, 1932, every common carrier by water in interstate commerce shall file with the board in full and complete detail and under oath statement of all transportation services engaged in by it, directly or indirectly; such statement to specifically show the ports between which such services are operated, the corporate name, or if not a corporation the name and the owner or owners of the carrier operating each particular service and the trade name or names, if any, used in connection therewith, the number of ships operated, the frequency of sailings to and from each port served, and with definiteness the character of the transportation service engaged in, such as whether of general cargo without restriction, of a limited class of freight, of refrigerator cargo, or of passengers.

"From and after date of enactment of the shipping act, 1932, no person shall inaugurate any service as a common carrier by water in interstate commerce unless and until there shall first have been applied for and obtained from the board a certificate that such service by such common carrier by water in interstate commerce is in the public interest justified. From and after such date of enactment no common carrier by water in interstate commerce shall, except by reason of force majeure, increase the number of ports served by it, the number of ships operated by it, the frequency of sailings, nor substitute one port for another, nor change the character of its service, nor shall any such carrier effect a change in its corporate or other identity or trade name or names, unless and until upon application by the carrier the board has issued a certificate that the public interest will not be adversely affected by such increase, substitution, or change. From and after such date of enactment no common carrier by water in interstate commerce shall, except by reason of force majeure, abandon its common-carrier service, nor decrease the number of ports served by it, the frequency of sailings, or the number of ships operated by it, except after 30 days' notice to the board of such abandonment or decrease: Provided, however, That upon application to the board setting forth exceptional circumstances and good cause the board may by permit authorize such abandonment or decrease upon shorter notice than here specified. From and after such date of enactment it shall be unlawful for any common carrier by water in interstate commerce to operate otherwise than in accordance with statement, certificates, notices, and permits filed or issued as provided for by this section, or to fail to operate in accordance therewith.

"All applications for issuance of certificates or permits as in this section provided shall be under oath, and all such applications and all notices filed as in this section provided shall comply with such rules and regulations as the board may prescribe.

"The board shall have power, after hearing, to issue certificates as provided for by this section, to deny issuance thereof in appropriate instances, or to attach to certificates issued such terms and conditions as in its judgment the public interest may warrant, and to which terms and conditions the applicant shall have consented. In all instances where a certificate is denied, or is issued with terms and conditions attached, there shall at the time be duly entered by the board of public record statement of its opinion as to how the public interest would be adversely affected should the certificate as applied for be issued.

"The statements of information, applications filed, copies of certificates and permits issued, and notices of abandonment or decrease provided for by this section shall be kept on file and of record in the offices of the board at Washington, D. C., and shall be open to public inspection.

"Any violation of any provision of this section shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000 for each act of violation and/or for each day such violation continues, to be recovered by the United States in a civil action.

"For the purposes of this section no intrastate common carrier by water participating in transportation with a common carrier by water in intrastate commerce shall be deemed a common carrier by water in interstate commerce."

SEC. 3. That the shipping act, 1916, as amended, is amended by the addition after section 16 of a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 16A. Any person or any officer, agent, or employee thereof who shall deliver property for transportation to any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act, or for whom, as consignor or consignee, any such carrier shall transport property, and who shall knowingly and willfully, directly or indirectly, by false billing or any other device or means, whether with or without the consent or connivance of the carrier, its officer, agent, or employee, obtain transportation for such property at less than the regular rates and/or charges then in force by such common carrier; or who shall knowingly and willfully, directly or indirectly, by false representation or other device or means, obtain any allowance, refund, or payment in connection with or growing out of the transportation of such property, whether with or without the consent or connivance of the carrier, whereby the compensation of such carrier shall be less than or different from the regular rates and/or charges in force by such common carrier at the time of such transportation, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, be subject for each offense to a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000."

SEC. 4. That section 17 of the shipping act, 1916, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 17. No common carrier by water in foreign commerce, or other person subject to this act, shall demand, charge, collect, observe, or enforce any rate, fare, charge, classification, rule, regulation, or practice which is unjust or unreasonable; nor any rate, charge, classification, rule, regulation, or practice which is unjustly prejudicial to exporters of the United States as compared with their foreign competitors.

"Whenever the board finds any rate, fare, or charge, or any rates, fares, or charges, or any classification, rule, regulation, or practice, demanded, charged, collected, observed, or enforced by any such carrier or such other person to be unjust or unreasonable or unjustly prejudicial in violation of this section it may determine and by order prescribe the maximum rate, fare, or charge, or the maximum rates, fares, or charges, or the classification, rule, regulation, or practice, to be observed by such carrier or by such other person, or by order requre removal of such unjust prejudice in such manner as in its judgment appears warranted."

SEC. 5. That section 18 of the shipping act, 1916, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 18. Every common carrier by water in interstate commerce and every other person subject to this act shall observe and enforce just and reasonable rates, fares, charges, classifications, rules, regulations, and practices.

"Every common carrier by water in interstate commerce shall file with the board and keep open to public inspection schedules showing all the rates, fares, and charges for or in connection with transportation between points on its own route; and, if a through route has been established, all the rates, fares, and charges for or in connection with transportation between points on its own route and points on the route of any other such carrier. The schedules filed and kept open to public inspection as aforesaid by any such carrier shall plainly show the places between which passengers and/or freight will be carried, and shall contain the classification of freight and of passenger accommodations in force, and shall also state separately each terminal or other charge, privilege, or facility granted or allowed, and any rules or regulations which in any wise change, affect, or determine any part or the aggregate of such aforesaid rates, fares, or charges, or the value of the service rendered to the passenger, consignor, or consignee. Such schedules shall be plainly printed, and copies shall be kept posted in a public and conspicuous place at every wharf, dock, and office of such carrier where passengers or freight are received for transportation, in such manner that they shall be readily accessible to the public and can be conveniently inspected.

"No change shall be made in the rates, fares or charges, or classifications, rules or regulations, which have been filed and posted as required by this section, except by the publication, filing, and posting as aforesaid of a new schedule or schedules, which shall become effective not earlier than 10 days after date of posting and filing thereof with the board, and such schedule or schedules shall plainly show the changes proposed to be made in the schedule or schedules then in force and the time when the rates, fares, charges, classifications, rules, or regulations as changed are to become effective: Provided, That the board may, in its discretion and for good cause, allow changes upon less than the period of 10 days herein specified.

"The names of the several carriers which are parties to any joint schedule shall be specified therein; and each of the parties thereto, other than the one filing the same, shall file with the board such evidence of concurrence therein or acceptance thereof as may be required by the board, and where such evidence of concurrence or acceptance is filed it shall not be necessary for the carriers filing the same to also file copies of the schedules in which they are named as parties.

"From and after 90 days following enactment of the shipping act, 1932, no person shall engage in transportation as a common carrier by water in interstate commerce unless and until its schedules as provided by this section have been duly and properly filed and posted; nor shall any common carrier by water in interstate commerce charge or demand or collect or receive a greater or less or different compensation for the transportation of passengers or property or for any service in connection therewith than the rates, fares, and charges which are specified in its schedules filed with the board and duly posted and in effect at the time; nor shall any such carrier refund or remit in any manner or by any device any portion of the rates, fares, or charges so specified, nor extend or deny to any person any privilege or facility, except in accordance with such schedules.

"The board shall by regulations prescribe the form and manner in which the schedules required by this section shall be published, filed, and posted; and the board is authorized to reject any schedule filed with it which is not in consonance with this section and with such regulations. Any schedule so rejected by the board shall be void and its use shall be unlawful.

"Whenever the board finds any rate, fare, or charge, or rates, fares, or charges, or any classification, rule, regulation, or practice, demanded, charged, collected, observed, or enforced by any common carrier by water in interstate commerce or by any other person subject to this act to be unjust or unreasonable, it may determine and by order prescribe the maximum rate, fare, or charge, or the maximum rates, fares, or charges, or the classification, rule, regulation, or practice, to be observed by such carrier or other person."

SEC. 6. That section 19 of the shipping act, 1916, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 19. Upon sworn petition by any common carrier by water alleging the charging of any unduly low rate, fare, or charge, or unduly low rates, fares, or charges, by any other such carrier with which the petitioner is in competition, the board may investigate and, after hearing, determine and by order prescribe such minimum rate, fare, or charge, or minimum rates, fares, or charges, to be observed by such other carrier, and/or such minimum rate, fare, or charge, or minimum rates, fares, or charges to be observed by the petitioning carrier as in the board's judgment the competitive situation between such carriers and existing circumstances may warrant. Upon its own motion and with the same powers the board may investigate any competitive situation between common carriers by water in which from information before it there appears to be involved the charging of unduly low rates, fares, or charges."

SEC. 7. That section 21 of the shipping act, 1916, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 21. That the board, in aid of the administration of this act, and without statement of reason other than that such action is deemed to be in the public interest, may require any common carrier by water, or other person subject to this act, or any officer, receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or employee thereof, to file with it any periodical or special report, or any account, record, rate, fare, or charge, or any memorandum of any facts and transactions appertaining to the business of such carrier or other person subject to this act. Such report, account, record, rate, fare, charge, or memorandum shall be under oath whenever the board so requires, and shall be furnished in the form and within the time prescribed by the board. Whoever fails to file any report, account, record, rate, fare, charge, or memorandum as required by this section shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $100 for each day of such default.

"Whoever willfully falsifies, destroys, mutilates, or alters any such report, account, record, rate, fare, charge, or memorandum, or willfully files a false report, account, record, rate, fare, charge, or memorandum shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and subject upon conviction to a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or to both such fine and imprisonment."

SEC. 8. That section 22 of the shipping act, 1916, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 22. Any person may file with the board a sworn complaint alleging a violation of this act by a common carrier by water, or other person subject to this act, and asking reparation for the injury, if any, caused thereby. The board shall furnish a copy of the complaint to such carrier, or such other person, who shall within a reasonable time specified by the board satisfy the complaint or answer it in writing. If the complaint is not satisfied, the board shall investigate it in such manner and by such means, and make such order, except as otherwise provided in this act, as it deems proper. The board, if the complaint is filed within two years after the cause of action accrued, may order the payment, on or before a day named, of full reparation to the complainant for the injury, if any, caused by such violation.

"The board, upon its own motion and with the same powers, except as to orders for the payment of money, may investigate any situation as to which, in the opinion of the board, a violation of this act may exist."

SEC. 9. That section 23 of the shipping act, 1916, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 23. Orders of the board relating to any violation of this act shall be made only after full hearing and upon a sworn complaint or in proceedings instituted by the board upon its own motion.

"All orders of the board other than for the payment of money made under this act shall continue in force until the board's further order, or for a specified period of time, according as shall be prescribed in the order unless the same shall be suspended, modified, or set aside by the board, or be suspended or set aside by any court of competent jurisdiction.

"Whoever knowingly fails or neglects to obey any order lawfully made by the board under authority of this act shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $5,000 for each offense. Every distinct violation shall be a separate offense, and in case of a continuing violation each day shall be deemed a separate offense. Such forfeiture shall be payable into the Treasury of the United States, and shall be recoverable in a civil suit in the name of the United States, brought in any district where the carrier or other person subject to this act against which the order is made, or its agent, maintains an office. It shall be the duty of the various district attorneys, under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States, to prosecute for the recovery of such forfeitures. The costs and expenses of such prosecution shall be paid out of the appropriation for the expenses of the courts of the United States."

SEC. 10. That section 24 of the shipping act, 1916, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 24. That the board shall enter of record a written report of every investigation conducted in pursuance of section 19 or section 22 of this act, stating its conclusions, decision, and order, and, if reparation is awarded, the findings of fact on which the award is made, and shall furnish a copy of such report to all parties to the investigation.

"The board shall publish such reports in the form best adapted for public information and use, and such authorized publications shall, without further proof or authentication, be competent evidence of such reports in all courts of the United States and of the States, Territories, districts, and possessions thereof."

SEC. 11. That section 27 of the shipping act, 1916, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 27. For the purpose of conducting investigations as provided for by this act the board may by subpœna compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, documents, and other evidence from any place in the United States, or any Territory, District, or possession thereof, at any designated place of hearing. Subpœnas may be signed by any commissioner and oaths or affirmations may be administered, witnesses examined, and evidence received by any commissioner or examiner, or, under the direction of the board, by any person authorized under the laws of the United States or of any State, Territory, District, or possession thereof to administer oaths. Persons so acting under the direction of the board and witnesses shall, unless employees of the board, be entitled to the same fees and mileage as in the courts of the United States. In case of disobedience of any subpœna lawfully issued under authority of this section, the board, or any party to the proceeding concerned, may invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring obedience thereto."

SEC. 12. That section 28 of the shipping act, 1916, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 28. That no person shall be excused on the ground that it may tend to incriminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture from attending and testifying, or producing books, papers, documents, and other evidence, in obedience to the subpœna of the board or of any court in any investigation or proceeding under or resulting from any provision of this act; but no natural person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing as to which, in obedience to a subpœna and under oath, he may so testify or produce evidence, except that no person shall be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying."

SEC. 13. This act may be cited as "Shipping Act, 1932."

REGULATION OF COTTON SUPPLY IN INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, yesterday I introduced a bill (S. 1698) proposing a plan with reference to the supply of cotton in interstate and foreign commerce, and it was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I have here a statement I made last summer, which was published in certain Alabama newspapers, explaining the provisions of the bill. I ask unanimous consent to incorporate it in the RECORD, together with the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The statement and bill are as follows:

BANKHEAD PLAN PUTS COTTON CUT UP TO FARMERS—SENATOR ELECT WOULD LET PLANTERS VOTE AND THEN MAKE DECISION BINDING—PRESENT LAW USED—PRODUCTION AGREED UPON WOULD BE LIMITED BY INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT

By Senator JOHN H. BANKHEAD

Overproduction of cotton is now recognized as one of the great problems confronting the southern people.

The mere announcement of a crop one and a half million bales more than was expected reduced the price to a level that made the crop of 15,500,000 bales worth $100,000,000 less than a 14,000,000-bale crop would have brought.

Acreage planted to cotton during the last six years has averaged approximately 10,000,000 acres more than the average for the preceding six years. The average yield is a bale to three acres. A surplus of more than 9,000,000 bales had accumulated prior to this year's crop.

Can overproduction be regulated so as to avoid, over a period of years, undue depression of prices and at the same time not unduly decrease consumption?

All economic discussion of the effect and prevention of a surplus has centered around the above question.

As it is conceded that an excess surplus is a constant factor of large proportions in depressing commodity prices, why not go direct to the root of the trouble and control the supply in a way that is consistent with economic principles and established laws of trade?

PUTTING IT UP TO THE FARMER

I propose a plan based upon the law of supply and demand. It puts the farmers in position collectively to regulate the marketing of their crops. It does not undertake any price-fixing. It is not a burden upon the taxpayers. It enables the farmers to limit the supply of certain staple commodities to the reasonable requirements of consumption.

The plan does not directly limit production. I know of no way under the Constitution for Congress to do that. The operation of the plan will, however, tend to reduce production when it is decided the supply should be reduced.

Can a way be found for all the farmers to reach an agreement on the quantity they will sell? I propose reaching an agreement by taking a vote of the farmers.

Can the agreement, when reached, be enforced? I propose using the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States to regulate and limit sales in interstate and foreign commerce in accordance with the agreement and policy adopted by the farmers.

THE PLAN

Without attempting to state the administrative details, but merely presenting the general outline and speaking in terms of cotton, the plan is as follows. The same plan would apply to wheat and probably to corn:

Use an average of production for the preceding five years as a beginning point. That average in cotton is 15,000,000 bales.

Arrange for a vote by the farmers, each owner of land used for production of the commodity to have one vote. The object of the vote is to ascertain whether a majority favor limiting the quantity that may be transported in interstate and foreign commerce during the crop year.

The vote should be taken through the mail at Government expense and under the supervision of suitable agencies. This could easily be done by sending a supply of ballots to postmasters and rural carriers throughout the area involved, with no postage required.

On the ballot should be presented the question: "Do you favor a regulation of the supply of cotton for the next crop year?"

On the same ballot should be provided a method of voting for the quantity to be transported in interstate and foreign commerce. That could be done by putting on the ballot the number of bales of cotton to constitute the supply, or by using percentages of reduction with the previous 5-year average as a basis.

If a majority vote for regulating the supply, but do not agree upon the quantity, an average of all the votes could be accepted as the will of the majority.

HOW ALABAMA WOULD FARE

Assuming that a 20 per cent reduction is voted for cotton, that would provide 12,000,000 bales which could be allocated to the States engaged in cotton production upon the previous 5-year average. For illustrations, let us suppose that out of the 5-year average total production Alabama has produced a 5-year average of 1,250,000 bales. A 20 per cent reduction would entitle Alabama to supply 1,000,000 bales.

Within Alabama its total could be apportioned to each county on a 5-year average production for that county, making a total of 1,000,000 bales for the State.

In each county a local board could apportion to the landowners on a 5-year average production for the various farms in cotton production, adjusting the total to fit the quantity to which the county is entitled. The 5-year average is suggested to take care of the varying weather conditions in different sections of the cotton area in different years.

When the apportionment to the various farms has once been made a basis for subsequent years will be fixed. Thereafter the local boards will have little to do except to make adjustments to fit the size of the crop voted for the succeeding year and to make adjustments for new land coming into and old land going out of cotton production.

A vote should be taken each year so as to adjust the size of the crop to current conditions and prospects and to abandon the plan if it did not prove satisfactory.

If a 20 per cent reduction should be voted, the farmer who has been producing 10 bales would have the right to sell eight bales for transportation in interstate and foreign commerce. If he produces more than eight bales he could carry the excess over until he had a short crop, or sell it to some one who did not produce his limit. If weather conditions reduce his production any year below his allotted amount, his license would be good in subsequent years until his licensed amount for all years had been supplied. If he can produce 24 bales in two years he would have his supply for three years. He can then devote the third year to other crops and also have his share of cotton for sale the third year.

WOULD YIELD MORE MONEY

This plan would adjust supply to demand and thereby stabilize and increase the price. It would save labor and cost and also acreage for other purposes and provide time and fields for diversified farming and for raising hogs and hominy at home. An annual crop of 12,000,000 bales would yield much more money than an annual crop of 15,000,000 bales.

Under the plan proposed each farmer would get a license permitting a fixed number of pounds of cotton, or its manufactured products, to go into foreign or interstate commerce. Practically all cotton or its manufactured product goes out of the State where the cotton is grown. It would be made unlawful to transport cotton in interstate or foreign commerce without a license.

The cotton buyer would require the shipping license from the grower. Local cotton mills would require the shipping license to support the right to ship the manufactured products. Interstate carriers could not haul the cotton or the mill products without the supporting license. The net result would be that without the shipping license cotton would not be salable in interstate and foreign commerce, and thus the agreement voted by the farmers would be enforced. The voluntary agreement would then have the force and effect of a Federal statute by making the agreement in practical operation the law of the land.

WOULD REASSURE FARMER

The farmers realize the disastrous results of too much cotton. A farmer who favors reduction does not reduce because he has no satisfactory assurance that a pro rata reduction by all others will be generally and uniformly made.

Here is a plan to make effective any limitation of supply that may be agreed upon by the producers.

About two-fifths of the world's consumption of cotton is produced outside of the United States. If too high a price is charged for American cotton, production abroad will be stimulated and substitutes like rayon will increase in use; but that fact should not cause the American producers to break the world prices by dumping huge surpluses on the market.

The laws of trade, national and international, will adjust the matter of prices after the farmer is put in position to get for his product all that the trade will reasonably stand by employing good business methods in marketing the crops. The farmer can avoid destroying a fair market by stopping his present destructive dumping of cotton on glutted markets. An increase in prices to a compensating level will not be materially reflected in the retail prices of cotton cloth.

Can such an agreement for limitation of sales be made effective and legally enforceable?

THE PLAN'S LEGAL ASPECTS

Under the power to regulate foreign and interstate commerce Congress can require a license to engage in such commerce. There seems no good reason why it can not under a licensing system limit the quantity of a particular commodity that may be transported in interstate or foreign commerce. The radio decisions are the nearest license case in point. Congress has required broadcasting stations to obtain a license to operate. That is done under the interstate commerce clause.

The license fixes the quantity of power the stations may use, and limits the frequency and hours for broadcasting. Congress has passed laws restricting, regulating, and prohibiting many uses of interstate commerce, and nearly all of these laws have been sustained by the courts. I can find no decision of the Supreme Court holding that Congress can not exercise the power I am proposing, for limiting under a license system the flow in interstate and foreign commerce of any commodity.

Why should an excessive surplus be offered on the market at the expense of buying it out of the market by the farmers or taxpayers if an excessive surplus can be kept out of the channels of trade and commerce?

The essence of the plan is the uniting of all the producers of a staple farm commodity into a cooperative to regulate the supply by the simple process of taking a vote of the producers to secure their decision on the quantity of the supply, and then to make their decision effective by exercising the power granted Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States.

To meet possible changes in economic conditions or changes in world consumption which may develop after the vote has been taken, flexible power could be given to the President, acting on the recommendation of the Secretaries of Agriculture and Commerce, to increase the quantity to be supplied.

If the price of cotton can be stabilized and increased so that our cotton farmers can realize a fair return on their investment, and a fair compensation for their work each year, and if the farmers will produce diversified crops on the acreage released from cotton under this plan and will turn their attention to improving the staple of their cotton, the South will again become the garden spot of America.

A bill providing for regulation of the transportation of cotton in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed to provide for taking a vote, during the crop year 1932 and subsequent crop years, of the owners of lands used for the production of cotton during the calendar year preceding that in which such vote is taken, for the purpose of determining whether or not such owners favor the regulation by Congress of the transportation of cotton in interstate and foreign commerce and the amount of cotton which, in the opinion of such owners, should be so transported during the calendar year next succeeding that in which such vote is taken. Such vote shall be taken by mail by means of ballots prepared under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture and made available for distribution in such manner as he shall prescribe. Each such owner shall be entitled to one vote. Such vote shall be taken during the week beginning on the first Monday in November of each year except that for the crop year 1932 the President is authorized by proclamation to fix the period within which such vote shall be taken. Upon the issuance of such proclamation notice thereof shall be posted in a conspicuous place in the post offices of each State in which any such lands are located.

SEC. 2. The ballots shall be mailed without requirement of postage to agents to be designated by the Secretary of Agriculture for the counties, parishes, or other similar political subdivisions in which such lands are located. No ballot contained in an envelope bearing a postmark later than the last day of the period within which any such vote is to be taken shall be counted in making up the returns. Within five days after the taking of any such vote all ballots submitted as herein provided shall be counted publicly by such agents and immediately thereafter the results of the vote shall be certified to the Secretary of Agriculture, who shall make a report thereon to the President. Such report shall show the number of votes cast in favor of and in opposition to such regulation by Congress and the average number of pounds of cotton which, in the opinion of the persons voting, should be transported in interstate and foreign commerce during the next succeeding calendar year. Such average number of pounds shall be determined by (1) taking the total number of pounds specified by such voters and adding thereto, for each voter who voted against such regulation and who failed to specify any amount in his ballot, an amount equal to the average number of pounds produced in all the States during the five calendar years preceding that in which the vote was taken, and (2) dividing the same by the total number of ballots cast less the number of ballots in which the voters who voted in favor of such regulation failed to specify the amount which, in their opinion, should be so transported in interstate and foreign commerce. In the event that a majority of the persons voting are in favor of such regulation by Congress, the Secretary of Agriculture shall also include in his report to the President a statement showing the average number of pounds of cotton produced in each State and in each county, parish, or other similar political subdivision thereof during the five calendar years preceding that in which such vote is taken. Upon the receipt of any such report the President is authorized by proclamation to make public the result of the vote and, if the report shows that a majority of the persons voting are in favor of such regulation by Congress, the proclamation shall also specify (1) the total amount of cotton to be transported in interstate or foreign commerce during the calendar year next succeeding that in which such vote was taken, which shall be equal to the average number of pounds determined pursuant to the vote as herein provided; and (2) the part of such total amount to be so transported from each State during such year, which shall be determined by the ratio of the average number of pounds produced in such State during the five calendar years preceding that in which the vote was taken to the average number of pounds produced in all the States during the same period. Upon the issuance of any such proclamation it shall be unlawful during such calendar year to transport any cotton or any manufactured or processed article containing 90 per cent or more of cotton in interstate or foreign commerce except as provided in section 3 of this act. Each such proclamation shall be issued on or before the 1st day of December of the year in which such vote is taken except that the first such proclamation shall be issued within 15 days after the taking of such vote.

SEC. 3. (a) The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized (1) without regard to the civil service laws to appoint a local board, to be composed of three members for each county, parish, or other similar political subdivision in each such State, for the purpose of issuing licenses to transport cotton in interstate and foreign commerce during the calendar year specified in any such presidential proclamation; and (2) without regard to the classification act of 1923 to fix the compensation of the members of each such board. Any person entitled to vote under this act may secure such a license upon filing an application therefor with the board under such regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe, accompanied by a statement under oath showing the approximate amount of cotton produced on the lands of the applicant in such county, parish, or other similar political subdivision during the five calendar years preceding that in which such vote was taken. The license shall specify the amount of cotton to be so transported, and such amount shall be determined by the ratio of the average amount of cotton produced on such lands of the applicant during such 5-year period (or part thereof during which cotton was so produced) to the average amount produced during such 5-year period in the State in which such lands are located. Such licenses may be transferred or assigned in whole or in part, and shall be issued with detachable coupons, or in such other form to be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture as will facilitate such transfer or assignment. Each such license shall be effective from the 1st day of January of the year next succeeding that in which such vote was taken and shall remain in effect until surrendered and canceled as hereinafter provided. The amount of cotton for which licenses may be issued during any one calendar year by any such local board shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture by the ratio of the total amount of cotton produced in the county, parish, or other similar political subdivision in which such board is located during the five calendar years preceding that in which such vote was taken to the total amount of cotton produced in the State during the same period.

(b) During any calendar year for which such licenses are required no cotton, nor any manufactured or processed article containing 90 per cent or more of cotton, shall be transported in interstate or foreign commerce from any State until it is stamped or labeled for purposes of identification, nor until there shall have been surrendered to an agent to be designated by the Secretary of Agriculture for such purpose licenses or parts thereof issued under this section sufficient to cover the amount of cotton and/or the manufactured or processed articles containing 90 per cent or more of cotton to be so transported. For the purposes of this provision the Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe a uniform method to be followed by such agents (1) for determining the number of pounds of cotton contained in any such manufactured or processed articles and (2) for the stamping or labeling of such cotton and manufactured or processed articles. The licenses or parts thereof so surrendered shall thereupon be canceled under rules and regulations to be established by the Secretary of Agriculture. The provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to articles containing 90 per cent or more of cotton which are manufactured or processed in a State other than that in which the cotton in such articles is produced.

(c) If the President is of opinion, upon the joint recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Commerce, that conditions warrant an increase of the amount of cotton to be so transported under license, he may by proclamation specify the additional amount to be transported from each State. Upon the issuance of any such proclamation the Secretary of Agriculture shall immediately notify the local boards in each State of the additional amount of cotton, determined as hereinbefore provided, for which they may issue licenses.

(d) For the purposes of this section, each such local board is authorized, by one or more of its members, to prosecute such inquiries and to require the production, by subpœna or otherwise, of such books, papers, and other documents as may be necessary to carry out the functions vested in it by this act.

SEC. 4. (a) The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized (1), in accordance with the civil service laws, to appoint and, in accordance with the classification act of 1923, to fix the compensation of such additional officers, experts, examiners, clerks, and employees, and (2) to make such expenditures (including expenditures for personal services and rent at the seat of government and elsewhere, and for law books, books of reference, and periodicals) as are necessary for executing the functions vested in him by this act. As far as practicable, the agents to be designated under sections 2 and 3, and the members of the local boards provided for in section 3, shall be persons employed in the field services of the Department of Agriculture.

(b) The Secretary of Agriculture is further authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, including regulations for the surrender and cancellation of licenses and for the stamping or labeling of cotton, and manufactured and processed articles containing 90 per cent or more of cotton, transported in interstate or foreign commerce pursuant to this act.

(c) The Postmaster General is authorized and directed to cooperate with the Secretary of Agriculture to the fullest extent possible the distribution of ballots to persons entitled to vote under this act.

SEC. 5. Any person who makes, or causes to be made, any false, misleading, or deceptive statement for the purpose of obtaining a license required by this act, or who willfully alters, or attempts to alter, the terms or conditions of any such license, or who, without being so authorized, attaches or removes, or causes to be attached or removed, any stamp or label required under this act or under regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, or who transports or attempts to transport any cotton in interstate or foreign commerce in violation of this act shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

SEC. 6. As used in this act, the term "person" includes an individual, partnership, association, or corporation.

SEC. 7. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

CONSERVATION OF WILD LIFE

Mr. McKELLAR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 263) to insure adequate supplies of wild life, plant and animal, including forests, fish, and game, for the people of the United States; to secure the correlation and most economical conduct of wild-life research and restocking and the elimination of duplication of effort and expense between the several departments of the Federal Government having to do with the same; to promote the development and extension of experimental stations for breeding; to promote studies of diseases and other factors limiting the natural supply, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

FINANCE COMMITTEE INVESTIGATIONS

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I offer a Senate resolution and ask that it be referred.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. May the resolution be read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 89), as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance, or any subcommittee thereof, hereby is authorized to sit during the sessions or recesses of the Seventy-second Congress at such times and places as they may deem advisable; to make investigations into internal revenue, customs, currency, and coinage matters, and other matters within its jurisdiction, and to compile and prepare statistics and documents relating thereto as directed from time to time by the Senate and as may be necessary; and to report from time to time to the Senate the result thereof; to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ such expert, stenographic, clerical, and other assistance as may be necessary; and all of the expenses of such committee shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate; and the committee is authorized to order such printing and binding as may be necessary for its use.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

RADIO-KEITH-ORPHEUM PROPOSED RECEIVERSHIP

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the other day I submitted Senate Resolution 58, authorizing an investigation of the refinancing of Radio-Keith-Orpheum Corporation. It now lies on the table. I am informed that it should go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I desire to modify the resolution by adding a paragraph at the end thereof covering the expenses of the investigation. I ask that the resolution, as modified, be referred to the committee.

There being no objection, the resolution, as modified, was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Whereas Radio Corporation of America has a substantial stock interest in Radio-Keith-Orpheum Corporation; and

Whereas Radio-Keith-Orpheum Corporation has publicly declared it has been unable through any bank or banks to secure necessary financial assistance; and

Whereas a proposed plan for refinancing Radio-Keith-Orpheum Corporation requires subscription by each stockholder to a pro rata of $11,600,000 debentures of said corporation and by failure so to do such stockholder is deprived of three-fourths of his shares of stock and the same is turned over to Radio Corporation of America as a bonus for purchasing such stockholder's unsubscribed debentures; and

Whereas such plan unfairly affects the interests of over 25,000 stockholders of 10 or more shares of Radio-Keith-Orpheum Corporation stock, and gives Radio Corporation of America other special privileges and shares of stock; and

Whereas the stockholders have been threatened by the president of Radio-Keith-Orpheum Corporation with a receivership of said corporation unless the plan is carried out and that a receivership would probably result in the loss of the entire investment of stockholders: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency, or any subcommittee thereof, as authorized by Senate Resolution No. 71, of the Seventy-first Congress, agreed to May 5, 1930, is hereby authorized and directed to fully investigate the refinancing of Radio-Keith-Orpheum Corporation, and particularly the ownership, sale, and transfer and price on the New York Stock Exchange of the stock of said corporation during the calendar year 1931, and the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized and empowered to exercise for the purposes of this resolution all the powers and authority contained in said Senate Resolution No. 71.

The expenses of this investigation, which shall not exceed the sum of $5,000, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee, or any subcommittee thereof.

AGNES O'CONNOR MOORE

Mr. LA FOLLETTE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 90), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the appropriation for miscellaneous items, contingent fund of the Senate, fiscal year 1931, to Agnes O'Connor Moore, widow of Peter H. Moore, late a messenger of the Senate under the supervision of the Sergeant at Arms, a sum equal to six months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON TERRITORIES AND INSULAR AFFAIRS

Mr. BINGHAM submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 91), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Seventy-second Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per 100 words, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

SHORT SELLING ON STOCK EXCHANGES

Mr. CAPPER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 93), which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Whereas a high percentage of the commerce among the several States and with foreign nations is carried on by corporations whose stocks, bonds, and/or other securities are listed and/or dealt in upon stock exchanges, such as the New York Stock Exchange, which are voluntary associations governed only by regulations made by their members, whose profits come chiefly from commissions on sales and purchases on such stock exchanges; and

Whereas the market value of the stocks, bonds, and/or other securities so listed and/or dealt in has an important, close, and direct relation to and effect upon the whole business of this country, and use is made of the Postal Service and of the various instrumentalities of commerce among the several States and with foreign nations in the purchase and sale of such stocks, bonds, and/or other securities on such stock exchanges and in the circulation of information with respect thereto; and

Whereas in the fall of 1929 a tremendous break in the market value of such stocks, bonds, and other securities inaugurated a widespread depression in this country, which has since continued and which has caused, and is causing, immense demoralization, stagnation, unemployment, loss, and suffering in all kinds of commerce and among people in every walk of life; and

Whereas according to accredited statistics, notwithstanding the previous declines in security values during the period already covered by the depression, there occurred (a) in the months of March, April, and May, 1931, a progressive decrease which aggregated $14,520,780,805 in the market value of the common and preferred stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange alone, and (b) in the single month of September, 1931, there occurred a decrease of $12,259,988,669 in the market value of the common and preferred stocks and of $4,207,526,124 in the market value of the bonds listed on the New York Stock Exchange alone, and during said month of September total failures were the highest and bank failures the second highest for all time, and the foundations of our financial structure seemed threatened; and

Whereas according to a public address made by Mr. Richard Whitney, president of the New York Stock Exchange, the short sales of the stocks listed on that exchange reached a peak of 5,589,700 shares on May 25, 1931, and again reached a peak of 4,480,000 shares on September 11, 1931; and

Whereas it is charged, and there is reason to believe, that the unnecessary short selling of securities on the various stock exchanges has contributed to the prolongation and intensification of the depression, in which view such important organizations as the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and the American Bankers Association, through their appropriate committees, have expressed concurrence; and

Whereas in view of the foregoing facts it is essential that there should be a full investigation of all matters pertaining to the short selling of securities on the various stock exchanges, followed by the adoption of such regulatory measures as may be found to be warranted: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and directed to investigate and ascertain fully and in detail (1) the short selling of stocks, bonds, and/or other securities which has occurred on the various stock exchanges, or by or through the members or stockholders thereof and the brokers and traders thereon, during the years 1929, 1930, and 1931; (2) the borrowing and lending of stocks, bonds, and/or other securities that has taken place for that purpose; (3) what persons, firms, associations, or corporations have participated in such short selling, borrowing, and/or lending, and in what securities and what amounts, either alone or in conjunction with others; (4) the practices, rules, regulations, and course of conduct of such exchanges, members, brokers, and traders with respect to such short selling, borrowing, and lending; and (5) the causes and methods of such short selling, borrowing, and lending, and the effect of such short selling on security values, on commodity values, and on the various businesses of the country. The committee shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable the results of such investigation and shall include in its report such recommendations for remedial legislation as it deems to be necessary from the facts ascertained by such investigation.

The Secretary of the Treasury, the Comptroller of the Currency, the Federal Reserve Board, and the Federal Trade Commission are hereby requested to place at the service of the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, such data and records, and to procure from time to time such information within their control, and to detail such assistants in connection with such investigation as the committee or subcommittee may from time to time request.

As used in this resolution (1) the term "stock exchange" means any place, board, or market, however created, organized, or conducted, where stocks, bonds, and/or other securities of corporations are bought and sold or offered for purchase and sale by owners or customers in person, or by or through stockholders or members of any such place, board, or market or brokers or traders acting on their behalf, and (2) the term "short selling" means any sale of a share of stock, bond, and/or other security in consummation of which there is delivered by or on behalf of the seller any stock, bond, and/or security not bona fide owned by such seller at the time of making such sale.

For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such public hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Seventy-second and succeeding Congresses, to employ such experts and accountants, and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, and to take such testimony and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per 100 words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $———, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

IMPORTATION OF MECHANICALLY GROUND WOOD PULP, ETC.

Mr. McNARY submitted a resolution (S. Res. 95), which was ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Tariff Commission is directed to make a thorough investigation of the effect of the depreciation in value of foreign currencies upon the importation into the United States of mechanically ground wood pulp, chemical wood pulp, unbleached or bleached, and pulpwoods, and to report to the Senate as soon as practicable the results of such investigation.

ADDRESS BY GOVERNOR WOODRING, OF KANSAS

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, I request unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Gov. Harry H. Woodring, of Kansas, before the National Women's Democratic Club in Washington, D. C., on December 11, 1931.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

The well-settled conviction of most easterners that the political beliefs of westerners are radical has as little foundation as the Kansas reputation for cyclones. True it is that in the nineties the Populist Party rose to supremacy in the West upon a platform so radical as to horrify the reactionary East. These men, evidently the "wild jackasses" of whom we have heard, advocated such ridiculous things as a direct primary, the income tax, the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people, woman's suffrage, and reform of the monetary system. Then the wild-eyed radicals of 1910 and 1912, the political sons of the wild jackasses of the nineties, wrote these theories into the laws of our country under the leadership of a college professor who had a sound knowledge of the history of government and a genius for its practical administration. These radicals, under his guidance, marshaled the progressive and enlightened political thought of the world behind the banner of Woodrow Wilson.

To-day, as one of the political grandsons of these "wild jackasses," I will attempt to transmit to you the political and economic beliefs of the most truly conservative section of this country. We are progressive but not radical, and are therefore conservative without being reactionary. The westerner is an individualist.

Our forefathers who settled our western country would have scorned to ask the Government for aid or even advice in the operation of their business affairs; they had confidence that they, as individuals, could wrest prosperity from an unpromising land and deal on equal terms with their neighbors and with the world. True, there are western leaders who have achieved national prominence, who advocate panaceas involving governmental interference in private business; but it is a peculiarity of the West that the people have not taken seriously the effect of the administration of the national Government upon their individual prosperity, and men are elected to office because of their personality and personal integrity rather than because of their political convictions. It seems to be the rule rather than the exception, that the two Senators from many of the Western States are opposed in their political convictions and theories.

Since arriving in Washington a few days ago I have heard on many a lip: "What of the West?" In my opinion upon the correct answer to the question, "What of the West?" depends the success of the Democratic Party in the next campaign, and upon the success of the Democratic Party under sane leadership, upon a sound platform, depend the prosperity and well-being of our country.

It would be fatal for the Democratic Party in the next campaign to appeal for western votes by advocating panaceas involving further governmental interference in private business, with a promise of artificial prosperity created by legislative act. The platform upon which the party will ride to success in the next election in the West must be constructed upon a basis, politically and economically sound.

Those who have read the history of this and of other nations realize that we are passing through that period of depression which inevitably follows an unbalanced prosperity. We also know that just as inevitably will our great Nation resume its irresistible onward surge toward a more enlightened, more prosperous civilization; but the untaught and unthinking see nothing beyond the temporary retreat, seeing before us a hopeless economic condition and would turn back from all progress, abandon every position won, and discard the greatest economic organization ever created by the intelligence, thrift, and industry of men. While calling attention to the failure of the present administration and its leadership we must not be prophets of gloom and desolation but do our part at this time in emphasizing the soundness of the principles upon which our western civilization is founded and the imperative need of continued faith in their ultimate merit.

What are these principles? We may differ in their definition but not in our recognition of the main objective to be attained. What we all seek, among other things, is prosperity and the leisure to develop our culture that comes with prosperity. The answer is that we have prosperity. It is elementary that wealth does not consist of money, which can not be eaten or worn and has no value except as a medium of exchange. Wealth consists of usable goods, the product of nature and the labor and intelligence of man. Since man first tilled the soil or tended his cattle, we have sought to increase the production of wealth. We have praised the man who made two blades of grass grow where but one grew before, or who increased the pounds of beef per acre of grass. We have spent millions in developing new areas from which wealth could be produced. We have acclaimed the inventive genius who, through modern machinery, multiplied the productiveness of the individual. We have mastered the machine, the flood, and the desert to increase the production of wealth. We have been successful. We have produced and now have wealth beyond the wildest dreams of our fathers. Our granaries are bursting. Our warehouses overflow with wealth. We have developed mass production in both industry and agriculture. With this wealth we can defy the specter of want and famine that once stalked periodically in our midst.

Our leaders proclaimed that finally man had mastered his environment, and in 1928 the Republican leaders assured us that we were entering upon a period of permanent prosperity, provided, of course, that these leaders were reelected to office. Yet to-day there is want and privation in our country. Large numbers of able-bodied men, eager and willing to work, can not earn the bare necessities of life for their families. We have a panic of plenty, and the existence of the situation is a tremendous indictment of our economic and governmental organization. Must we confess the indictment and discard our system? Of course, we will do so if we can find something better; but we should pause before we discard our traditional system for one new and untried. Before we advocate discarding it let us learn something about it and we will be convinced that the indictment can not stand. We will find that our ills are caused by our failure to remain true to our own principles.

First, ours is a popular form of government, a democratic organization of society that has as its fundamental theory the principle of government by and with the consent of the governed. No individual is long permitted to usurp dictatorial powers or to encroach upon the rights of the collective citizenry of the Nation.

Second, in our economic organization we are intensely individualistic. Our tremendous industrial organization, our modern development of an industrial civilization is a monument to the genius and intelligence of the individual American. Such cooperative effort as we have exerted has been by the voluntary association of individuals working for their own advancement and own interest and not by coercion of the Government.

The economic and governmental organization are not inconsistent in theory. Our Nation is completely individualistic. The collective control of the Government is the organized expression of the wishes of the individual American. The fate of governments in city, State, and Nation is subject to the wishes and desires of a majority of the individual voters.

Our Government has pursued its sometimes bungling course throughout the rise and fall of kings, emperors, dictators, and other governmental organizations in other lands. The uneven but continuous rise in the prosperity and well-being of our country, with its minimum of the horrors of revolution, has entrenched in the minds of every thinking American a belief in the present organization of our Government which approaches a form of religion. This firm belief can not be uprooted by fallacious arguments and theories advanced by the radical champions of unsound political ideas, who are continually urging us to throw overboard our traditional theories and enter upon some new Utopia.

Many of these new ideas may seem plausible. The man of the street who does not have time for research into political philosophy and can not refute the arguments advanced nevertheless refuses to abandon his faith in his constitutional Government. This faith is based upon the collective experience of his race as taught at his mother's knee and confirmed in the schools until it will and does withstand and disregard argument and persuasion.

The merit of our economic organization is not so firmly established in the minds of the people. From the inception of our Government there have been constant assaults upon the theory of free individual economic action. Governmental control of business and governmental operation of business enterprises have been advocated and are now advocated by men of influence who occupy high places in our Government. It might be, and in fact often is, argued that if the people collectively are competent to run the Government, they are competent to control the vast industrial enterprises which serve our Nation. This theory is based upon a lack of comprehension of the fundamental differences in the governmental and economic functions.

The Government is and should be a fixed and known quantity. The chief merit of any form of government is permanency. The advantage of our form of government is that the heads of the Government may change but the form is permanent, while the death of a dictator may overnight entirely change the form of his government. Generally speaking, changes in our fundamental governmental organization are unnecessary as government is static in its nature. It is most permanent when controlled by the collective action of the individuals of the Nation.

On the other hand, our economic organization presents an entirely different situation. Economic forces generated over world-wide areas and, influenced by caprice of nature and the inventive genius of man, are in a state of constant movement. It is not possible for anyone to predict the action of these forces. Under our present system the individual capitalizes and exploits the resources of nature and the developments of modern science and invention. The deposits of coal, oil, and other raw materials are exploited and result in the wealth of individuals. Modern inventions may bring an individual or individuals wealth far beyond a reasonable compensation for their services to society. On the other hand, many individuals labor hard and intelligently in other fields but suffer privation and want. It is this system which is attacked by those who would have the Government appropriate all natural wealth and inventive genius and distribute the benefits among the people. Our individualistic system is attacked as wasteful. In the Russian communists' primer, which has circulated somewhat in our country, some very disturbing statements are made concerning our wasteful methods as compared with the well-planned activities of the Russians under their 5-year plan. I will admit that our system is somewhat wasteful, but nature itself is wasteful. Untold billions of young animals, insects, and plants are born each year; but only a minute percentage of the most fit survive. So in our business and industrial organizations thousands of business and industrial enterprises are launched each year and only a small percentage of them survive. These survive because they are most fit economically to serve the people. By this process of elimination we keep our economic organization at highest efficiency. The efficient survive, the inefficient perish. This is wasteful and sometimes cruel.

Thousands of business and industrial enterprises are perishing, with resultant want and privation for those connected with them as owners or employees. At this time the Russian plan stands out as having merit because it is in the process of construction. It may, for a time, succeed beyond the expectation of any of us. Eventually, however, changing conditions and economic evolution will render obsolete some of the factories, whole industries will require reorganization, then the weakness of the communistic structure will destroy it. The fundamental weakness in an economic organization is the element that lends strength to government; it is its permanence and resistance to change. The government in business will be static as in its other functions. The nation which permits its government to operate and control its business and industrial enterprises will be left far behind by the nations in which freedom of individual action permits continued progress, increasing change, and, therefore, increasing efficiency in its economic organization.

The present distressing economic conditions can not be charged to defects in our economic theories. On the contrary, they are to be charged directly to our failure to adhere to our individualistic system. Something more than half a century ago a new political organization arose from the ashes of the parties which had fought vainly for 50 years to destroy the Democratic Party. This new Republican Party rode into power in the Nation upon the great moral issue of slavery. Following the Civil War, its chief issue gone, containing no cohesive forces within itself, leaderless after the untimely death of Lincoln, the direction of the party was assumed by predatory interests. Under their control the party embarked upon a program of subsidizing industry. The theory was that by giving special privileges to a few, who would thereby prosper greatly, some of this prosperity would be distributed to the multitude. In other words the Congress of the United States, composed of men of all classes, few of them with any specialized knowledge of political economy, attempted, by law, to interfere with the operation of economic forces. They were fortunate. Their program was instituted at a time when the whole world was entering upon a period of industrial expansion. Credit for every advance made by the business and inventive genius of the United States was claimed by the party in power. The protective tariff, greatest of governmental subsidies, became the gospel of the wealthy class which used the Republican Party to serve its own interests.

We prospered, not because of the tariff but in spite of it. The unbalanced prosperity which should naturally follow the artificial stimulation of the prices of manufactured goods was balanced by the increase in value of new land opened in the West. The profits of the East were poured back in investments and loans in the West, thereby maintaining its buying power in spite of increasing prices of manufactured products. The final reckoning came when the value of western land and western products reached and passed the peak.

Following the World War other nations, seeing our prosperity, likewise assumed that it was builded upon the rock of protection; tariff walls were raised against us; the world market for our agricultural products was immediately injured. Our market was not only curtailed by the retaliatory tariff but also by a lack of ability to exchange goods for our exports. Finally, in 1926, for the first time in history, the exports of agricultural products dropped below the exports of manufactured products; the agricultural West was gradually losing its world market and its consuming power correspondingly decreased. We found a large section of our country selling its products below the cost of production upon a vanishing world market and at the same time purchasing its manufactured goods upon a protected market at a high price. No permanent prosperity in this Nation could exist under such conditions. The consuming power of the West vanished and the manufacturing East suffered and is now suffering the penalty of its greed. For a time the industrial machine moved on of its own momentum; from the West came cries of distress which were unheeded.

The leader of the remnant of a once great Republican Party has continued to speak of individualism as opposed to paternalism in government; but when these effects of governmental interference became apparent, the administration has sought to give us a larger dose of the medicine that has caused our ills. We subsidized the Shipping Board, with the well-known lamentable results; we lost the money invested and lost the shipping. The Smoot-Hawley bill—farm relief tariff bill, designed to artificially stimulate prices, resulted in the collapse of the values of industrial stocks and brought about a world-wide depression. Then the Farm Board undertook to save the wheat farmers, and at an expense of nearly $200,000,000 managed to bring the price of wheat to the lowest in the memory of all present, involving the utter collapse of the market for all farm products. Then we had the moratorium, through which a gift of the taxpayers' money to foreign nations was expected to return us to prosperity by making possible the construction of a few more battleships in Europe. And, lastly, we have the great credit plan through which the taxpayers' money will be loaned upon security which good bankers or conservative private investors will not accept. We have an abundance of private money available for loans on good security, so the new credit plan can be helpful only as it puts the money of the large income-tax payers into circulation by loaning it upon doubtful security. The invalid who goes from one doctor to another, seeking relief for his disease, when nature finally effects the cure, gives credit to the last doctor that gave him a pill. It may be that the great depression is over and that we are on the upgrade. If so, I assume credit will be claimed for the last effort made by the floundering national administration.

The Democratic Party must not be misled by the clamor of some political leaders in the West, who, despite the horrible example before us, advocate governmental assistance as a means or permanent relief for agriculture. I will admit that our tariff can not be immediately abandoned. It is no mere coincidence that the panic of 1929, as all panics of history, immediately followed a drastic revision of the tariff laws or tinkering with our monetary system. The lowering of tariff schedules must be started immediately, but must be gradual; and in the meantime we of the younger generation, we grandsons of the wild jackass, are not content to point at the mistakes of the past. We are looking to a better day, but we have the immediate pressing need of the present. We can not permit men and women to starve in the midst of plenty while awaiting the slow operation of economic laws to adjust and repair the havoc wrought by past mistakes. We will not suffer continued discrimination against our section of the United States. If any party or administration attempts to restore an artificial prosperity to industry at the expense of the rest of the Nation you will find the West in political rebellion. If the policy of the Federal Government is to subsidize industry, then we demand subsidies for the agricultural West. Sound, conservative principles will not permit us to consent to continue to pay tribute to one section of this country. Western industries must be placed temporarily upon a parity with the East so as to restore a normal balance. But while the West may demand a tariff on oil to save a stricken industry and ask that the benefits of the tariff be extended to agriculture through a tariff-debenture plan, such a practice will not be acceptable as a means of even temporary relief unless coupled with a permanent program leading to the elimination of all governmental subsidies and unnecessary governmental interference with business. It is not necessary that we negotiate for the reduction of retaliatory tariffs or await the action of foreign countries to remove the obstructions from the channels of world trade. We can not be injured by any influx into this country of wealth in the form of usable goods that might follow the gradual lowering of our tariff walls.

While I have advocated individualism and opposed governmental interference in business, it does not follow that the Government has no concern with economic problems. There are certain functions which are necessarily governmental. One of the first and primary duties of government with relation to business is the maintenance of a sound but flexible currency and monetary system to provide a medium of exchange the face value of which does not fluctuate. Internal order and amicable international relations can only be maintained by wise and sane leadership in the national administration. We should have no concern with the political or military problems of other nations other than to offer our services as mediator in international disputes, as an individual nation or as a member of an organization of nations formed for that purpose. With one branch of business organiaztion the Government is vitally concerned. While we commend and develop competition in individual enterprise, in one field there is no place for competition. Modern science has created a supply and modern civilization has created a demand for certain services which by their very nature must be rendered by monopolies. The service of gas, water, light, telephone, etc., can not best serve and be competitive. In order to obtain efficient service it is necessary to grant certain privileges to the individuals, or public-utility corporations, which render the service. Since these public utilities are natural monopolies and are owned and operated by individuals, we find that the greed which directs the actions of many individuals is not lost when those individuals become the stockholders or officers of corporations. Corporations reflect the minds and souls of their officers, and we have in this country corporate interests directed by executors as rapacious, greedy, and ruthless as the fiercest pirate that ever scuttled a ship or ravaged a seaport. It is a settled policy of this country to provide regulations preventing unreasonable charges to the consumer which would naturally follow such a noncompetitive system when in the hands of greed. The large scope of these public-utility corporations makes it necessary that the National Government assist in their regulation and control, and they should be regulated and controlled by whatever means are necessary, even though it be through the retention of governmental control and ownership of some of our natural resources.

In the early days of this country the construction and maintenance of highways was a private enterprise, but the consistent policy of municipal, State, and National Governments in this country has been to consider this as a governmental function. Since this is now a purely governmental function, it would be better for the Government to devote its resources and expend its income, or use its credit, to relieve the unemployment situation and facilitate the return of business activity by permanently investing in highway construction the enormous sums which are now being expended in futile and disastrous attempts to interfere with economic forces and artificially stimulate the prosperity of private enterprises.

In conclusion, I wish to repeat that I do not come from the West to seek relief but to point out that the relief for eastern distress can not be found in an unbalanced prosperity that does not increase the consuming power of the West. Prosperity will return when the economies of mass production are passed on to the consumer with similar profits and lower distribution costs; when the product of a given number of hours of skilled labor on the farm may be exchanged for the product of the same number of skilled hours in the factory or the channels of distribution, with the farmer, the manufacturer, and the merchant receiving a reasonable return upon his prudently invested capital. We in the West know adversity; but on western farms to-day happy families are living in good health, enjoying the wonderful western weather; western farm children are attending grade schools, high schools, and colleges in the best school systems ever produced by civilization. We have butter, eggs, milk, livestock, and bread grain in abundance. In time past the West has weathered many a panic and survived—the West will again survive and the sun of prosperity will again smile down on western plains. Again the western farmer will demand and get the standard of living which is the right of every honest, intelligent, and industrious citizen of America; but that day will not be hastened by an excess of an unreasoned panic or by an abandonment of our fundamental principles.

Our institutions are builded upon the rock of unrestricted individual initiative. I do not fear that they will be torn down unless the foundation be destroyed by an increase of our dependence upon governmental aid and paternalism. I, for one, do not wish to see the Democratic Party aid in its destruction. We should seek new stones to add to its strength and security, and those stones are a greater and further reliance upon the initiative and the inventive and business genius of the individual American. Come to the people of the West with such a rock-ribbed, conservative platform, radical only in its simplicity, and we will drive from the citadels of our Government the shortsighted, greedy, industrial autocracy which has controlled our Nation. This industrial autocracy which has sought to use the Government as an instrumentality for its private profit, whose tentacles of corruption in the past have reached into the inner circles of the national administration and undermined the faith of the people in the integrity of their public servants. Write into your platform the principles of Thomas Jefferson, without panaceas, and the people of the West will place the Democratic Party at the helm of the ship of state on its return journey from the depths of the Hoover depression.

My friends, out of the West come the grandsons of the wild jackass, proud of their heritage that christens them progressive but not radical, conservative but not reactionary.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD four editorials appearing in the Arizona Daily Star.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The editorials are as follows:

[From the Arizona Daily Star, December 5, 1931]

A DANGEROUS PLAN

The recommendation of a committee of President Hoover's conference on home building and ownership, now in session at Washington, of mass production of homes through the instrumentality of a credit corporation of $5,000,000,000 is a matter of grave importance to the country. Such a recommendation if carried out would lead to the gravest sort of consequences.

First of all, such a plan would depreciate the value of every home and apartment house now standing. The addition of such a supply to the housing of the country at this time would empty thousands, in fact, hundreds of thousands of homes that are now standing. Empty homes and apartments can not pay interest on existing mortgages, and neither can they pay the taxes and street assessments. Hundreds of thousands of people who have invested their money in houses and apartments would stand to lose entirely the equities they now own.

No need exists to-day for the mass production of homes. Even a growing city like Tucson has plenty of empty houses and apartments, the owners of which are having a difficult time meeting interest charges, street assessments, and taxes. But there are comparatively few growing cities like Tucson in the country. Most of the towns and cities of the country are overburdened with empty houses and apartments, the owners of which face a real struggle in meeting interest and other charges. Many of these houses represent lifetime savings and were bought with the idea of having something for income in old age. To-day many of these owners face a serious problem of meeting living expenses on account of the loss of income. The proposal to add millions of additional homes will wipe out the investments and incomes of hundreds of thousands of people.

Not only will such plan destroy the investments of the owners but it will seriously affect security owners, owners of mortgages on existing homes. As many of these mortgages are owned by banks and building and loan associations the banking situation will be strained even more.

The President's statement that a need exists for a financial organization for financing home building, which will permit people of small means to own homes, is a great exaggeration and misstatement of fact. In his speech before the conference he stated that the proposed organization would finance home ownership up to 75 per cent of the cost, the home owner providing the rest. He did not state that all of that can be done to-day without a national financial organization. Anybody of good character can to-day, here in Tucson, build a new home by furnishing 25 per cent of the cost as a down payment. In fact, here in Tucson to-day it is possible to buy a home by paying down 10 per cent of the purchase price and agreeing to pay out the balance in monthly payments no larger than the usual monthly rent. In fact, it is possible to purchase a $5,000 home in Tucson to-day by paying down as small an amount as $250. Why, then, should there be a mass production of new homes? What need is there for a national home-financing organization?

The gravest effects from the execution of the plan proposed by the conference would not be felt for several years. For a few years it would bring immense activity to the building industry, but at the end of a few years the home building of the country would have been anticipated for so many years that the building trade and skilled laborers involved would be without work for many, many years. It must be remembered that our rate of population growth is declining rapidly, and that by 1950 our population will be stationary.

The President's proposal carries with it such grave and dangerous consequences to the entire social and financial structure of the country that it is hard to believe that he really means what he says. It is inflation, dangerous inflation, which in the long run will do irreparable harm, not only to the financial structure of the country but to the cause of home ownership as well.

A DISAPPOINTING PROGRAM

The mountains groaned and a mouse was born. President Hoover assembled a number of business and political leaders at the White House to work out some kind of a definite plan for relieving economic distress. Now comes word that as a result of these deliberations all that is to be done is to form some kind of a discount bank to take over frozen banking and credit assets and to create some type of credit structure to furnish money for home building. President Hoover expressed himself as believing that such measures will alleviate the credit stringency and promote business and industrial activity.

It can be said in favor of the President that the plan to create a credit structure to take over the frozen banking and credit assets might be of some temporary benefit, although much can be said against it. It will give temporary relief, but it is merely a narcotic. It is an attempt to doctor the result of an illness and not to remove the cause. It can not rectify the fundamental reason of our economic distress. Rather it is but a postponement of attempting to cure the causes. The plan to make available a large amount of credit for home building overlooks the fact that the unwise and senseless expansion of credit of the past seven years is one of the fundamental causes of our economic dislocation. The results of the conference at the White House are thus comparatively negligible as far as going to the root of our present troubles.

Many hoped, when they heard that the President was working with business and political leaders in the conference at the White House, he had awakened to the fact that the time had come to end the propagation of economic nostrums and trying to alleviate economic distress by Government edict. The lesson the country has learned from the operations of the Farm Board and other such Government activities seems to have been forgotten, and instead of getting down to fundamentals, the real causes of present conditions, the President comes forth with another program of Government relief and activity which will merely aggravate conditions rather than help. It amounts to nothing short of political and economic humbuggery.

The principal cause of present world conditions has been excessive public expenditures. For 15 years the world has been mortgaging the future by means of bond issues and other types of borrowing to carry on wars, impossible government social programs, and reckless government expenditures. Now, instead of profiting by the lessons to be learned from Australia, England, Germany, Austria, and other countries, the President proposes to follow in their footsteps. The world has been consuming wealth faster than it has been created. That is one of the principal reasons of the present dislocation. The President proposes to add more.

These ambitious programs have imposed an impossible burden on industry. They have created a feeling that a government by simple edict can create wealth and restore the economic balance. Without exception they have led to political unrest, loss of confidence, and a mental condition of hopelessness throughout the world. And now President Hoover advocates similar plans which will inevitably end in disaster.

Before economic balance can be restored several fundamental errors must be corrected. The political animosity between Germany and France is being buried. That is one of the most encouraging things that has happened. A general election in England will take place soon. If the national government is returned and England brings a halt to her unwise experiments, that will be another long step in stabilizing political conditions and economic conditions in that country. The international war debts must be scaled down. They can not be paid, regardless of the fact that they should be paid. It is sheer political humbuggery, deliberate ignorance of actual conditions and misrepresentation to claim that they must be paid. The insane tariff walls erected by all nations, the impossible trade restrictions imposed, must be changed to a lower level. Normal trade conditions can not return until there is the freest possible flow of goods in international commerce. Imagine what chaos we would have in this country if each State erected a tariff wall. The excessive armaments of the world are another factor, but what would it profit the world to reduce them and then spend the money on other wealth-consuming projects?

The President's announcement is a keen disappointment. It is a mere sop thrown to the public. The measures he proposes will be of no more value than the Farm Board and will breed still more such valueless and senseless schemes, all of which must be paid for by additional taxes. They add to the burden of the country. They do not help.

Many people believed that as a result of the conference the President would dare to become the leader of his country, that he would fearlessly acquaint the American people with the true situation and ask them to support him in calling for an international conference to settle permanently the question of war debts, another conference to reduce the tariff walls and to remove senseless trade restrictions, and to ask for their support in reducing excessive public expenditures in every department of government which are blighting industry the world over by the heavy taxes they impose.

Unfortunately the President seems to doubt the good sense of the American people. More and more it becomes apparent he lacks courage and determination to do what he knows must be done. The White House conference and the results announced from it are a complete fizzle. The mountains groaned and a mouse was born. The American people will realize it before the next year passes.

THE PROPOSED DISCOUNT CORPORATION

Yesterday afternoon the Tucson clearing house, composed of all Tucson banks, deferred action on participation in the formation of the national discount corporation planned by President Hoover. Its reasons for this delay may be summed up by stating that all of the Tucson banks are in a liquid and sound condition, are capable of meeting all demands of their depositors, and that since subscription on their part would amount to around $250,000, such a subscription would weaken their conditions without any compensating advantage. None of the Tucson banks is in need of the help the discount corporation is designed to give.

An adverse decision of the clearing house is, we believe, a wise one. The Tucson banks are in a liquid and sound condition. Subscription to the discount corporation proposed by the President would impair their position. They have been called upon, together with all other banks throughout the country, to subscribe 2 per cent of their deposits to the formation of the corporation. With the funds thus subscribed the discount bank plans to purchase slow loans from banks to enable banks with such loans to meet the demands of their depositors. As the banks of Tucson have no need of this help they would be furnishing over $250,000 to aid incompetent or dishonestly managed banks located elsewhere. In other words, it would mean that they would freeze 2 per cent of their deposits for the benefit of weak and badly managed banks by investing in the debentures of the discount corporation which have no assured earning power or market value.

The success of the President's plan depends upon the willingness of the banks of the country to subscribe 2 per cent of their net time and demand deposits. Although the New York banks subscribed their share immediately upon announcement of the plan, there is good reason to believe that the banks of the country will hesitate to follow suit. Most of the weak banks of the country have been eliminated. The successful and conservative banks that remain, which have kept themselves in a liquid and sound condition and which have followed honest banking practice, will view with disfavor any plan that requires them to freeze 2 per cent of their assets. It is not sound and proper banking practice. It will not be surprising if the discount corporation fails to obtain the necessary subscriptions. Refusal of the banks of the country to participate, instead of being a calamity, will be a blessing, for it will mean that competently and honestly managed banks will continue to maintain their liquid position and not impair their capital and surplus by tying up 2 per cent of their deposits in securities of doubtful value.

It might be well to give some other details of the plan. Elsewhere in this issue is published the telegram received by the Tucson clearing house. It is the only information it has received, and it is upon this information that it has been asked to act. Briefly it might be summed up as follows: As a means of relieving the strain on banks and liquidating the receiverships of ones that have been closed, President Hoover recommends the formation of the national discount corporation. The corporation will be formed under the laws of Delaware, with a capital stock composed of 12 shares of stock, one for each Federal reserve district. It will have power to issue debentures (bonds without a definite interest or security) to the extent of $1,000,000,000. Half of this amount will be issued immediately upon subscription by the banks of the country. All banks, State and national, are called upon to subscribe 2 per cent of their deposits and take in return these debentures. The money subscribed will be used to purchase slow loans of the type which can not be discounted by the Federal reserve banks. By this means it is hoped when a bank faces a crisis it can discount its slow paper with the discount corporation and get in return cash with which to meet the demands of its depositors. The plan contemplates aid in liquidating closed banks by taking over slow and frozen loans and making the funds thus set free available to waiting depositors.

The weakness of the plan lies in the fact that it calls upon good banks to weaken their own position for the benefit of weak, incompetently, and dishonestly managed banks. For a subscription of 2 per cent of its discounts to debentures of the discount corporation does mean freezing 2 per cent of the deposits and impairing the capital structure to that extent. Analysis of the causes of the failures of so many banks shows that most of the closed banks have been closed on account of inexcusable incompetency, extravagant expansion, failure to diversify loans, and shameful looting by officers and directors. Authorities charged with acting upon the reports of examiners have failed to act and for political or other reasons have temporized with such managements and allowed the situation to get beyond control.

The President's plan, as far as the formation of the discount corporation is concerned, amounts to the century-old plan of guaranteeing bank deposits in a new dress. It has been proven unsound in theory and practice time and time again. Developments of the next few weeks will show that the good bankers of the country will refuse to impair their own institutions by declining to subscribe to the debentures of the corporation, just as the Tucson banks should do.

CONGRESS AND THE HOOVER MORATORIUM

When the Hoover moratorium comes up in Congress this winter it will arouse a storm of oratory and acrimonious debate. Particularly will this be true in the Senate, where the rules permit unlimited debate and where already formidable opposition has raised its head.

One of the strongest and most popular arguments against the adoption of the moratorium proposal is that it is a scheme whereby the United States will forego collection of the international war debts that the international bankers may collect what is due them. For, it will be shown, since the signing of the treaty of peace in 1919 the international bankers of New York have loaned Germany over a billion dollars in direct loans, besides many additional billions in investments in German industrial enterprises. Proponents of this argument will point out either that what the Allies owe us for war debts can not be connected with what Germany owes the Allies in reparations or they will declare that the reparations from Germany and the war loans are an underlying lien and come ahead of all subsequent loans. On this ground the opponents will attack the moratorium as a scheme of the international bankers to get their money back and make the Government wait for what is due it.

This line of argument has considerable truth in it. In fact, it has so much truth in it that it reveals the reasons why the reparations and war debts must be scaled down and ultimately canceled. The American public does not realize that these Government debts are intimately intertwined with politics. We may say quite truthfully and correctly that the allied debts to us can not be connected with reparations, but merely saying so and announcing such a policy does not change the situation. It is true that we do not consider these debts as political ones, but the Allies do, while the Germans consider the reparations as distinct unbearable political burden.

The only money the Germans owe direct to international bankers are the short-term loans amounting to around $600,000,000 in the form of trade acceptances and German treasury bills. The trade acceptances are owed by German firms who bought goods, such as cotton and copper, from the United States and paid for them by giving a promise to pay for them at the end of a short period. They constitute purely private debts and have no political connections. The treasury bills bought by the banks are similar to what we call in this country tax-anticipation certificates such as our own State sells pending the receipt of tax money twice a year. They have no direct political connection.

In this connection it is well to remember that this money advanced by the international bankers was used to pay for Arizona cotton and copper, Middle West wheat, and a host of other things. Had these advances not been made the industrial and agricultural situation in this country would be much worse than it is. If Congress or Germany says that the payments of these loans must follow reparations loans, the international bankers will say: Very well, we will take our loss, but in the future we will advance no money for the purchase of American products by German private industrialists, nor will we advance any more money to the German Government in the form of tax-anticipation loans. International trade with Germany would come to a standstill without the short-term financing granted by international bankers, of which the short-term credits now frozen in Germany are a typical example.

Since the adoption of the Dawes plan private and international bankers did loan many hundreds of millions of dollars to German municipalities and German industrial corporations. That they loaned too much money, and that much of the money was wasted, everybody admits. But it was loaned in an effort to help Germany rehabilitate her industry and start her industrial enterprises so that she might pay off the reparations. Had these loans not been made the question of the war debts would have reached a crisis long ago.

Furthermore, the money represented by these loans is not owed to the international bankers. It is owed to thousands of individual savers and estates and other investors who bought them from the international bankers. They, not the bankers, stand to lose.

Of course, the bankers can be criticized for selling such loans. But suppose the bankers had refused to make the loans? They would have been denounced for not helping to make America's resources available to help Germany. As all of these loans bore high rates of interest they were on their face speculative. Safe loans do not bear high rates of interest.

This consideration of the entire question reveals that it is futile and a waste of time to attack President Hoover's proposal on the ground that it is a scheme of the international bankers to get their money. The intergovernment war debts are political debts and must be treated as such. If Germany did not owe a dime of other debt, she would continue to storm and use every possible means to escape payment of reparations, because she feels it is an unjust burden placed on her by superior force. As long as the reparations exist in an amount and form unacceptable to the majority of her people they will be a subject of bitter controversy, and the principal disturbing factor in a strained international situation.

Since his conversations with Premier Laval and Signor Grandi and the conversations between Laval and Bruening, President Hoover undoubtedly will recommend action that will bring this long and bitter question to a peaceful and satisfactory solution.

Nothing Congress could do to help the unemployment situation would be of more value than to give hearty support to the Chief Executive who alone with the Secretary of State can conduct negotiations on international questions. No revival of business can come until this question is settled on a fair and just basis to all.

CONGRESS AND THE DEBTS

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in the New York Herald Tribune of this morning is a very illuminating article by Mr. Walter Lippmann on Congress and the Debts. In view of the discussion we have had in the Senate I think this article is well worth reading and I therefore ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune, December 15, 1931]

By Walter Lippmann

Even though Congress will not have approved the moratorium before December 15, when debt payments are due, there is, of course, no question that eventually approval will be given. The necessary votes have been pledged, and the debtor governments can in no sense be considered to be in default.

Nevertheless, the fact that the payments will have been suspended without the formal approval of Congress may have considerable practical effect. For once it is admitted that the approval need not be given by December 15, there is no compelling reason why Congress should not investigate and debate the matter at its leisure. There is no longer a fixed date when the business must terminate, and experience shows that the more a debate involving foreign affairs is drawn out, the greater the strength of the irreconcilable faction. Therefore, although the moratorium will be ratified, unless the matter is now taken promptly and firmly in hand by the responsible leaders of both parties, we may well see a debate in the course of which the irreconcilables will succeed in exacting as the price of ratification commitments which will paralyze the Government in arranging a settlement for the future.

A study of the debate last week will show, I believe, that this is no empty speculation. Two things were made plain. The first was that in both parties there is a deep resentment at the action of the Executive in committing Congress to the moratorium by the extra legal methods of last June. The feeling is deep that the President has tried to deprive Congress of its right to consider so important a matter carefully, that in refusing to call a special session he allowed Congress only eight days in which to organize itself and deal with the moratorium, that his procedure proclaimed his distrust of the Congress and infringed its dignity, that he and the world at large must be made to realize that Congress is a coordinate branch of the Government.

It may be regrettable that Congress is so touchy. But Congress has always been touchy, and it would have been the part of wisdom to remember it. An unnecessary amount of trouble could have been avoided on this score by calling Congress into special session one month earlier. The moratorium would now have been ratified, and a debate bound to disturb the delicate negotiations now in progress abroad, terminated.

The second point brought out by the debate last week was the extent to which the Congressmen, owing to their long absence from Washington, have lost touch with the realities of the world crisis. They have been at home confronted with the pressing difficulties of their constituents, and many of them have not had time or opportunity to understand the difficult and complex matters which they are now called upon to determine. The administration has, so to speak, grown up with the situation by daily practical experience. Most of the Congressmen have had only the most meager information for the last nine months, and quite evidently do not realize what has been happening in the world.

Thus many Congressmen approach the question of the debts believing that, first, it is within the power of Congress to determine whether the debt payments shall or shall not be made; second, that these debt payments are of great importance to the United States; and, third, that the plea for a year's moratorium and of subsequent reduction is simply a scheme worked out by the bankers who have frozen credits in Germany. These beliefs arise not out of bad will but out of misunderstanding, which it is the business of the administration and of responsible newspapers to clear up patiently and sympathetically. It is a pity that the time is short, for events are moving fast, but there is no short cut under our system of government.

In regard to the assumption that Congress has a free choice as to the debts, it may be said that international debts from great nations can not be collected by force. The real choice is not between payment and nonpayment, but between a settlement which the debtors can execute, and one which throws them into bankruptcy. If Congress insists upon the letter of the bond, it can create financial chaos in central Europe, but it can not compel all the payments to be made.

In regard to the belief that debt payments are of vital importance to us, it may be pointed out that this year the suspended payments are about one-sixteenth of our Federal expenditures and slightly more than one-tenth of the deficit. On our financial scale they are a small item. A reduction by one-half would be less costly than the losses of the Farm Board. It would be less than the deficit in the Post Office.

In regard to the international bankers, it may be pointed out that there is no conflict of interests between taxpayers and the holders of foreign bonds and credits. The private creditors have already taken heavy losses on their foreign investments. They will, no matter what happens, have to write off more than the taxpayers will be asked to write off on the governmental debts. Both need a world recovery to recoup. In a world collapse both suffer. Neither group can get out at the expense of the other, for in a general bankruptcy both must lose and in a general recovery the whole problem would disappear.

If Congress will just make up its mind that what is at stake is not its dignity or the President's, not $250,000,000 of the taxpayer's money or $2,000,000,000 of private money, but the recovery of the world from a great depression, it will be seeing the matter in its true perspective. In the last analysis Congress is not dealing with the German Government and the British Government; it is dealing with the two markets which are more valuable to American producers than all of Asia and South America combined. If, moreover, Congress will realize that the economic fate of the Continent of Europe is inextricably tied up with the fate of Britain and Germany, and then will look at the figures, it will see that even last year in the deepest depression the purchases of Europe were greater than all the rest of the world put together.

The problem before Congress is to help make the world a going concern. Congress represents the greatest producing Nation, and it would wholly fail in its task if it forgot that fact in order to concentrate its energies on making itself a mere debt collector.

CHICAGO AN OCEAN PORT

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a short address delivered by Col. William Nelson Pelouze, chairman of the Illinois Deep Waterway Commission, at the convention of governors at Chicago in the present month.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

It would be difficult to adequately visualize the benefits that will accrue to Chicago and the other cities on the Great Lakes, as well as to the great interior of the United States, when the St. Lawrence River is open to through navigation for deep-draft ocean-going vessels.

The cities on the Great Lakes will then become ocean ports. Eighty-five per cent of the vessels of the world will be able to ascend the St. Lawrence River and enter the Great Lakes. Manufacturers and farmers of the Central West will then be on an equality basis, so far as cost of water transportation is concerned, with their seaboard competitors to the markets of the world.

There are 40,000,000 people who live adjacent to the Great Lakes who are practically landlocked, so far as having access to the ocean. This vast population is entitled to buy and sell in the markets of the world and should be privileged to do both at the lowest possible cost in transportation. The St. Lawrence is the world's greatest natural waterway and is destined to be the world's most useful seaway.

Quite recently two foreign vessels sailing from commercial ports of Continental Europe have arrived in the port of Chicago, carrying cargoes consigned to one of our largest commercial houses. Another vessel from Norway has just arrived at South Haven, Mich., with a cargo of 3,000 tons of wood pulp. This is reported to be the first of nine vessels that will arrive at that port with similar cargoes before the 1st of January. Within the past three years the Kohler Co., of Kohler, Wis., has received 11 cargoes of china and ball clays from England. These cargoes were discharged at Sheboygan, Wis., after a voyage of 4,000 miles across the Atlantic, up the St. Lawrence, through four of the Great Lakes, to their Wisconsin destination in 30 days. Ex-Governor Kohler, the president of the company, stated that by using the St. Lawrence route there has been a saving of $4.16½ per ton, as compared with the combination water-and-rail rate over the old ocean haul to Philadelphia and thence by rail to Kohler, Wis. He stated that in the past three and one-half years the saving to his company on freight by way of the St. Lawrence River has amounted to $89,000. This offers ample evidence of the economic soundness of the St. Lawrence project. The vessels were of a size that could navigate the present 14-foot locks of the St. Lawrence River. These few instances should be all we need to visualize what it will mean to the great Central West when the present locks of the St. Lawrence River are replaced by locks of 30-foot depth, so that deep-draft ocean-going vessels will be able to ply between the cities on the Great Lakes and the commercial markets of the world.

It is officially reported that there are 125,000,000 tons of water freight that originate on the Great Lakes annually. The records show that during the past year of navigation over 100,000,000 tons passed through the Detroit River. That is more than the tonnage that passed through the Panama Canal during the first nine years of its operation.

As a further indication of what might be expected when the St. Lawrence project is completed, the records show that from the 1st of April to the 10th of December of last year the number of ships that passed through the locks of the St. Lawrence River exceeded one for every half hour, night and day, Sundays and holidays, and was equivalent to over 8,000,000 tons.

There is more involved in the St. Lawrence waterway than the saving of freight. New opportunities will be opened by this new line of communication. It will afford to the manufacturers of the Central West a road to markets that is now closed to them. It will open avenues by which they can draw their raw materials from all parts of the world that are now inaccessible. Its benefits can be indicated but they are beyond calculation.

The railroads must realize the important part they will play in the transfer of cargoes to and from the cities of the Great Lakes when they become ocean ports.

Sir Henry Thornton, president of the Canadian National Railways, in an address made at Cornwall, Ontario, stated:

"Much has been said of the development of the St. Lawrence as a deep-draft waterway. I hope that the day will eventually come. We do not regard the development of any such great natural waterway as a competitor, but look upon it as something which will build up traffic, assist in the industrial development of the Dominion, and in the last analysis we will find that we shall have gained very much more than some people imagine we will have lost. In the interior of the United States and Canada there lies a great inland ocean—the Great Lakes—and they are connected with the ocean by the noble St. Lawrence River. To my mind it is inconceivable that a barrier shall exist or be permitted to exist between the area of this great inland sea and the ocean. I believe that it is inevitable that the Great Lakes and the ocean must be connected by a waterway of sufficient draft to accommodate ocean-going vessels."

When Cartier discovered the St. Lawrence in 1534 and other explorers followed him up into the Lakes, across to Rainy Lake and the Lake of the Woods, and then up the Saskatchewan another thousand miles, and again through the Wisconsin Valley into the Mississippi and by the Illinois route down to the Gulf of Mexico, they marked out the main paths that traffic would follow in the civilization of the North American Continent.

It was settled more than a hundred years ago, when Canada built the first shallow canal to overcome the St. Lawrence Rapids. It has been more firmly settled with every passing year as the commerce of that natural highway has steadily expanded.

From the head of navigation on Lake Michigan to the Atlantic Ocean is 2,500 miles, all an active water highway. For a thousand miles between Chicago and Buffalo there is the busiest inland marine traffic in the world. For a thousand miles from the ocean up the St. Lawrence to Montreal there is a volume of commerce that has made Montreal the second largest port on the North Atlantic seaboard.

There is no great public improvement pending to-day that is of more vital concern or promises greater benefits to the industrial and agricultural interests of the United States and Canada than the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway.

The St. Lawrence project presents no extraordinary engineering problems. It has been proven to be feasible, workable, and practical. The only wonder is that it has not been completed and in operation these many years. It is the natural outlet and offers the line of least resistance for a navigable waterway to connect the Great Lakes with the Atlantic Ocean for ocean-going vessels.

We are told that the St. Lawrence River flows from Lake Ontario to the Atlantic Ocean, a distance of 1,000 miles. As a matter of fact the St. Lawrence as a river proper is only about 350 miles long, because the Gulf of St. Lawrence extends inland as an open sea nearly to Quebec. The St. Lawrence River is 80 miles wide at its mouth. It is a tidal river for about 500 miles. Its width throughout its entire length is measured in miles.

The engineers tell us that there is no river on the American continent that is so well known, so well understood from an engineering standpoint as the St. Lawrence. They inform us that a survey made anywhere in the St. Lawrence River to-day will be found to be practically the same 25 years hence. This condition does not prevail in most rivers, where variations occur from year to year.

From the city of Quebec to the city of Montreal the entire distance is now open to deep-draft, ocean-going vessels. In the distance of 182 miles between Montreal and Lake Ontario about 138 miles are now open to practically unrestricted navigation. This would leave, therefore, approximately only 45 miles to be covered in completing the St. Lawrence development.

There are two impediments to connecting the Great Lakes with the Atlantic Ocean by way of the St. Lawrence River. One is the Niagara Falls and the other is the three groups of rapids just west of Montreal.

These rapids are separated by two lakes, Lake St. Louis, 16 miles long, and Lake St. Francis, 30 miles long. To overcome these rapids it is proposed to build eight locks, each lock 860 feet long, 80 feet wide, and 30 feet deep. The locks will lift the ships 220 feet.

The other impediment, Niagara Falls, separating Lake Ontario from Lake Erie, is now overcome by the new Welland Canal, recently constructed by the Canadian Government at a cost of $130,000,000. The old Welland Canal has become obsolete or inadequate owing to its limited draft of only 14 feet.

The new Welland Canal is the fourth canal built by Canada since 1833. The length of the canal is 25 miles. All the lifting of ships will be done within a distance of 7 miles west of Lake Ontario. There are seven locks, of the same width and depth as the locks that will overcome the rapids farther east. These seven locks will lift ships 326 feet and will take the place of the 26 locks in the old Welland Canal. While it has taken a ship drawing but 14 feet of water 16 hours to overcome Niagara Falls in the old Welland Canal it will only take a ship drawing from 20 to 25 feet 8 hours to overcome the falls in the new Welland Canal.

The Welland Canal is an integral part of the lakes-to-the-sea navigation problem. That the Canadian Government has expended $130,000,000 in building this new canal is practically an assurance that Canada is going through with her part of the comprehensive project. The outstanding achievement on the part of Canada seems all the more remarkable when it is realized that the population of the Dominion of Canada is only a little in excess of the State of Illinois. The United States will have equal access to the use of the canal without the payment of tolls, as provided for under treaty agreement.

In 1918 an amendment was offered in the Senate of the United States, to the rivers and harbors bill, requesting the International Joint Commission to investigate and report what further improvement was necessary in the St. Lawrence River to make it navigable for ocean-going vessels.

Fortunately the International Joint Commission had been created by the Treaty of 1909 between Great Britain and the United States. One of the provisions of the treaty being that the commission in addition to its duties specifically set forth in the treaty, was to investigate and report on any matter that might be referred to it by either Government. The International Joint Commission was, therefore, qualified to take up the important matter of the St. Lawrence development.

In July, 1921, after two years of a most thorough and painstaking investigation, the International Joint Commission reported to the Governments of Canada and the United States unanimously favorable to the St. Lawrence project. The commission based its report on the great commercial need of connecting the Great Lakes with the Atlantic Ocean for ocean-going vessels.

With ocean terminals at our lake ports loaded cars could be sent to these ports, their loads turned over to the waterways with unlimited transportation facilities, and the cars returned for more loads.

With the St. Lawrence waterway completed the ships would go right through to the commercial ports of Europe. Freight rates would be reduced, all congestion would be removed, and the ships would reach their destination without loss or delay.

The St. Lawrence is not an inland waterway, as that term is generally used. The St. Lawrence way is not to get out to the ocean, but to move the ocean inland, and make the Great Lakes an integral part of the ocean for "world marketing."

When we speak of inland waterways we are thinking of getting to an ocean port where loading can be had on an ocean-going ship. When we speak of the St. Lawrence we are thinking of placing ocean ports on the shores of the Great Lakes. We are thinking of the larger thing of giving these lake ports a sea base for rate making to world markets.

The St. Lawrence is the natural way of connecting the ocean with the Great Lakes—the greatest inland sea of the world. The St. Lawrence is the connection that links the ocean to these great inland seas, with an adjacent population of 40,000,000, and now carrying 27 per cent of the total tonnage of the United States.

The States of the upper Mississippi Valley form the greatest food-producing region in the world. The production could be multiplied many times as the demand grows. The annual grain production in the area that will be influenced by the St. Lawrence waterway averaged about 3,660,000,000 bushels. If the United States is to continue to export grain, it must be able to meet competitive world-market prices. The cost of transportation, therefore, seriously enters into the price. It is conservatively estimated that when the St. Lawrence River is open to through navigation there will be a saving of about 10 cents a bushel on the grain for export. The price of the crop is the price of the surplus. If only one-half of this saving was to attach to the producers, whose price is the market price less the cost of transportation, the American farmers would benefit to an amount of $150,000,000 annually. If, to the saving of freight on grain alone, we add the saving in our shipments of industrial products, you can readily visualize what the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway will mean to the producers of this country from the standpoint of dollars and cents. It is estimated that there will be a saving of $10 a ton in the shipments of meats, lard, and dairy products; and on our heavier products, such as steel, from $5 to $6 per ton.

Illinois exported an average during the years 1928, 1929, and 1930 of manufactured products to the value of $215,000,000. Her averaged imports amounted to $49,000,000 during the same years. Most of the exports went by rail to the seaboard cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, where the cars were unloaded, the products transported across the cities and reloaded in ocean-going vessels.

With the St. Lawrence Waterway completed for deep-draft ocean-going vessels, these export products will be loaded in ocean vessels at Chicago and shipped direct to the commercial ports of Europe at a tremendous saving in freight. Chicago will then be on an equality basis, so far as the ocean base rate is concerned, with New York.

Every importer and exporter in the States adjacent to the Great Lakes would be an enthusiastic advocate of the St. Lawrence project, because it will mean to them increased profits by the saving of millions of dollars in transportation costs. The same will apply to our imports. The ships now discharging imports at New York which are later brought to the interior of the country by rail will come up the St. Lawrence River and enter the Great Lakes and their cargoes discharged at Chicago and other cities on the Great Lakes. The long railroad haul both to and from New York with the excessive handling charges will be eliminated.

As all exports must meet competition on the basis of supply and demand in the various "world markets," it is obvious that the cost of transportation must be deducted before the producer is paid.

The farmer who sells wheat in Liverpool must accept the price there minus the transportation and handling costs. He must meet in the Liverpool market the seller from every part of the world. The "routes and rates" are therefore vital; they directly enter into and affect his profits.

Seventy per cent of the grain exported goes direct to Liverpool, and the St. Lawrence route is the shortest and most direct and, therefore, the cheapest in the cost of transportation.

Rates on the ocean usually average about one-tenth the rail rates between important shipping points. Rates on the Great Lakes are about on a parity with ocean rates and average less than 1 mill per ton-mile.

It costs almost precisely the same to ship a bushel of wheat by rail from Kansas City to St. Louis (8.1 cents), a distance of 277 miles, as it does to ship it from New York to Liverpool, a distance of 3,578 statute miles under normal conditions.

Assuming that the St. Lawrence waterway is open for ocean-going vessels and that the cities on our Great Lakes are now ocean ports, the rate on grain from Chicago to Liverpool will be 10 cents a bushel. This gives the farmer of the Middle West who gets his grain to a lake port the advantage of the base ocean rate of 10 cents per bushel. It puts him on a parity with the farmer who now has the advantage of the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific base rate.

At present the route and rate is from Chicago or Duluth to Buffalo, by water, 3 cents per bushel; Buffalo to New York, rail, 9.1 cents; New York to Liverpool, 8 cents; total, 20.1 cents per bushel. The new St. Lawrence rate will be Chicago or Duluth to Liverpool direct, 10 cents per bushel. The savings, therefore, by the new route to the "world markets" will be 10 cents per bushel.

Presidents Wilson, Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover all strongly advocated the St. Lawrence project.

In 1924 President Coolidge appointed a commission with Secretary Hoover as chairman. A similar commission was appointed by the Premier of Canada. The function of these commissions was to review the report of the International Joint Commission and make further investigation. Associated with the commissions were three eminent engineers of Canada and of the Regular Army of the United States.

These two commissions reported to the Governments of the United States and Canada under date of November 16, 1926, following the example set by the International Joint Commission of five years before, by reporting unanimously in favor of carrying out the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence project.

There are 23 States committed to the St. Lawrence waterway. These States are associated in an organization known as the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Tidewater Association. The Council of States is made up of the governors of these 23 States together with the members of the Commissions appointed by the governors in pursuance to the acts of their legislatures.

Some of the States make appropriations. The money is used to finance and support the Tidewater Association, which is national in scope and whose activities and functions can be more economically administered than though the States acted independently.

Egypt and Phœnicia led the world when trade began. Then Greece, Rome, and Carthage; in later years Venice and Constantinople. From one to another shore the supremacy shifted, but it never left the Mediterranean coast.

The scepter passed, however, when the ships put to sea on the wider ocean. First Spain and Portugal, then Holland and England gained the world's leadership. The scepter passed from hand to hand, but it stayed with the seafaring states.

Industrial development gave a new bearing to commerce. Supremacy was for the people who had coal, iron, and skill. Old England was first in Europe, New England was first in America. Access to the raw materials gave advantage to the island kingdom and the seaboard States.

New times have come to America, new times have come to the world. The trade of the world is more closely knit. Its competition is keen. Success will follow as ever on power, resources, and energy. The greatest reward will come to those who are located on the world's highways.

America has been busy these hundred years in winning this western world. Now a new continent has at last been subdued. The energy of a great people, bred of high purpose and enterprise, now seeks a new direction. The West is ready to place itself besides the Englands, old and new. We have the land, we have the people, the power, the resources, and the energy; there is just one thing lacking—the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence way to the sea.

THE SILVER QUESTION

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD an article by a former Member of this body, Charles S. Thomas, of Colorado, entitled "The Unimportance of Silver."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

THE UNIMPORTANCE OF SILVER

(A reply)

If the revived interest in the subject of international bimetallism is merely "a bubble of silver relief," it will, like all bubbles, soon collapse under external pressure and hardly prove even of transient concern to anyone beyond the dwindling circle of those yet identified with silver production, who retain little beyond the right in common with all others to invoke the aid of their Government for the relief of a distressed industry, however untenable or even ridiculous their appeals may prove to be. I dare to assert, however, that the verdict of silver's unimportance at this time of stress is not only premature but is not sustained by Mr. Lawrence's very interesting contribution to the World's Work for August.

I concede at the outset that expedients finding shelter under the broad advocacy of bimetallism, and sponsored by some distinguished disciples of the subject, have been urged for the relief of a serious and distressing situation in the Orient which can not recommend themselves to mature reflection.

But these are by-products of every movement, successful or otherwise, which becomes prominent in the march of human affairs, and if we permit them to shut out the perspective of the picture, we can not hope to form an intelligent judgment upon its merits.

The immediate concern of the silver producer in the tremendous issue of bimetallism is obvious, but is only that of the gold producer in the prevalent monetary scheme, and deserves similar consideration, albeit, the silver miner as such is almost an extinct species. His argentiferous mines are virtually exhausted; and the dominant producers of the metal are now the great copper and smelting companies, which are relatively few. Indeed, the prospector and his burro, symbol of the miner of 50 years ago, has long been a reminiscence. Gold also is becoming more and more a by-product of the copper miner, with little prospect of change; so let us strive, if we can, to consider the merits of the double standard from the more impersonal viewpoint of the public needs.

Silver, like gold, was primary money in our country down to 1873, and served us well while it so functioned. In that year it was summarily deprived of its sovereign attribute by a statute approved by a President who afterwards protested that he never suspected its real purpose.

Those of us who have devoted over half a century to a fairly comprehensive study of the double system may readily assure the public that we fully concede the impossibility of securing free coinage for silver by encouraging such empirics as silver pools, utilization of our silver reserves, or loans of silver bullion to other countries.

We feared the Bland and Sherman silver compromise bills of 1878 and 1900 would prove Trojan horses cunningly thrust inside the walls by the manipulators of the time, and designed to fasten the strangle hold of the new dispensation upon the Republic. Events confirmed our apprehensions. Both were laws establishing the compulsory coinage on Government account of specified amounts of silver bullion purchased in a competitive market; and both were to be administered by unfriendly officials. The Sherman Act, to be specific, expressly provided that the Treasury certificates issued thereunder should be redeemed in gold or silver coin at the discretion of the Secretary. In administering that law, Secretary Windom promptly transferred the option to the creditor, on the pretense that parity was not otherwise attainable. Mr. Carlisle, his successor, followed his example; which not only made possible but encouraged the raids of 1894–95 upon the Treasury gold reserves, and which in turn apparently justified Mr. Cleveland's bond issues, handled by Mr. Morgan with such credit and profit to himself. Thus the train was laid for the triumph of the gold standard in 1896.

Space forbids anything more than the barest outline of a background for this inquiry into the merits of the rapidly renewing demand for a return to bimetallism. At the outset it must be borne in mind that nothing new is involved in the movement; for the system, before its ruthless extinction, had stood the test of more than 40 centuries, and functioned better than any other method of determining values thus far devised. During all that time, the legal ratios applied to the two metals have conformed with remarkable accuracy to the relative ratios of their production; and the small occasional variations in value from them have automatically adjusted themselves.

The white metal, being the more abundant and least valuable in bulk, has not only done monetary service in those minor transactions of everyday occurrence, which comprise the vast bulk of the world's activities involving the common people and representing their property values everywhere, but represents the hoarded savings of 20 generations of Asiatics; it was never abundant nor more than 16 to 1 in bulk with the yellow metal; it was never rejected in the service of the world's commerce until degraded or debased by legislation conceived and enacted by and in the interest of the public creditor. Yet, in defiance of such legislation, it has persisted as the measure of values for and the money of more than half the population of the globe, albeit every fall in its gold price decreases the value of their possessions, enhances the burden of their debts and impairs their purchasing power. Through and because of its debasement, the single gold standard has become the silent but most effective method of universal confiscation ever devised. Hence, the values thereby lost will inevitably return to silver with the repeal of the edicts by which it has been outlawed.

When, in February, 1873, the bill innocently entitled "An act revising and amending the laws relative to the mints, assay offices, and coinage of the United States" was tendered to President Grant for approval, that dignitary signed it in ignorance of its real purport. Had he dreamed that its title was a deception, he would, of course, have disapproved it. At the time the measure was passed, the bullion value of the silver dollar was 101 cents in gold. The only attention given by the press to the bill throughout its consideration was the Associated Press dispatch of January 17, 1873, announcing that "The mint and coinage bill that passed the Senate this afternoon is a codification of all existing statutes on the subject." This was due not to its indifference, but because the newspapers, like Congressman, knew nothing about it.

For some time afterwards the public remained either ignorant of or indifferent to the tremendous fact that, under the cover of a mintage act, the monetary system of the country had been profoundly altered; that silver had been deprived of its right of legal tender, denied access to the mints, degraded to a commodity, and that gold had become the sole standard of value and alone available for the payment of public and private debts in excess of sums of $10; and national, State, municipal, and corporate bonds had been enormously enhanced in value overnight by a trick of legislation. The primary cause of the panic of 1873 was thus revealed to an astonished Nation about a twelvemonth after it had run its ghastly course of misery and despair.

The effect of the exposure may be easily imagined. The expressions of public wrath were unrestrained. Speaker Blaine of the House, leading Members, prominent Senators, Cabinet officers, solemnly announced their ignorance of the character and purpose of the bill for whose enactment many of them were responsible, while the demand for its prompt repeal was unanimous. For the first time since the Civil War the people in 1874 elected a Democratic House by a 2-to-1 majority. A monetary commission, appointed under joint resolution of August 15, 1875, reported on March 2, 1877, affirmed the charges made against the act and the manner of its enactment. The testimony supporting the report is even yet of absorbing interest and should have borne prompt and affirmative results. But those who engineered its framing and enactment and whose fortunes were ultimately more than doubled through the Nation's travail, were on guard. The press, the banks, the Federal Treasury, obsequious politicians and rival parties all were drafted in the cause of "sound money," and the wrong yet remains to be righted. The havoc it has wrought during over a half century of existence admits of no exaggeration.

Our experience has been that of other nations under identical conditions similarly created. England in 1816, and Germany in 1873, victors of two great wars, the first loaded with an enormous debt, the second about to harvest an enormous indemnity, demonetized their silver, destroyed values, increased the burden of the public securities, and robbed the people of their substance.

When, after the Great War, and responding to the needs of the world's economic revival, silver rose to the unprecedented gold price of $1.40 per ounce, and the horizon was gilded with the promise of prosperity to all the nations, it was our own Treasury Department which, running true to form, quietly, illegally, and successfully abstracted 13,000,000 of silver dollars from the national reserves and used them to break the foreign silver market. The details of this disgraceful episode will be elaborated hereafter.

But we are cheerfully assured that "silver is unimportant," that the agitation for its monetary restoration is merely "a brand of special pleading"; and reasons are assigned to support the charge so made. If they sustain it, there is nothing more to be said.

At the outset we are told that silver is in dire distress. That is true of all commodities, and the two causes assigned for it apply to all of them. They are "the drop in the price of the white metal and the unfavorable turn in the exchanges" of the silver-using countries. These conditions, however, are said to attend a paradox; "for as the value of all other goods and services declines, the value of gold goes up. This is a bull movement in the gold market when all other markets appear helpless in the face of bear pressure."

True; but the so-called bull movement in the gold market has operated intermittently for over 115 years. The drop in silver prices and the rise in gold values are always reciprocal. It is the expression of the same thing in another way. It is the gold vampire in action, sucking the life blood from the substance of mankind, insatiate and unappeaseable. And like other vampires, it gorges itself as long as its victim has any blood to yield, then turns its fangs upon itself and dies by suicide. There is nothing paradoxical about it, and the formula is simple. When one end of a seesaw descends, the other must rise. It would be a paradox if it didn't. Decrease commodity values and you increase the burden of debt. Make the debtor pay $2 for every one he agreed to pay or take all he has upon default; such is the mission of the single standard. Just now, as in 1873 and 1893, it is garnering its harvest. "Silver is unimportant." Neither are wheat, nor oil, nor sugar, nor anything but gold.

The statement quoted defeats the author's entire argument. One material substance, infinitessimal in quantity, is absorbing the material possessions of mankind, transferring their substance to its owners, wasting their energies, destroying their ambitions, and reducing them to economic slavery. The one solution of the problem known to human experience is bimetallism, condemned as usual without hearing and spurned as a nostrum of special pleading. The only alternative would be another abnormal increase in gold output such as immediately succeeded the Bryan defeat in 1896; a phenomenon not likely to repeat itself.

Mr. Mark Sullivan tells us in his History of Our Times that two obscure engineers in South Africa, McArthur and Forrest by name, unconsciously cleared our financial skies in 1897 by discovering the cyanide process for cheap extraction of gold from low-grade ores, thereby prodigiously increasing the world's annual production. The discovery of the Rand and Klondike deposits synchronizing with the development of the new process supplied the void caused by silver demonetization, thus bringing to naught for the time the forecasts of the economists of the day. But this was to postpone, not to prevent the final show-down. The golden harvest is drawing to its close, with no prospect of its renewal; the lean years preceding 1896 are returning and with them the problems then so insistent for permanent solution.

We are reminded that, China, Persia, and Eritrea excepted, the world is upon a gold basis. As a yardstick of debt measurement and collection that is true, even in the countries named. But the fact remains, and history demonstrates, that silver can no more be expelled from the world's exchanges than can man live without respiration. Even when gold ceases to function, as it so frequently does, silver remains the universal handmaiden of commerce. A drudge she may be, but man's indispensable servitor she remains. The Kemmerer recommendation may be forced down the throat of starved and stricken China's 500,000,000 paupers, but will gold supplant silver or ever circulate in the marts of Shanghai? Will the change do anything whatever for that country beyond handing her a yardstick for her debts which she never sees but which she has been compelled to employ for a hundred years under the commercial guns of the "sound-money" nations?

The effect of a fall in the gold value of silver is admirably described by Mr. Lawrence; but here again he ignores the fact that unless some antidote be provided against it the consequence is ruin. It is true that silver varies in price, just as any other commodity, but so does gold when measured as everything ultimately must be, not by itself, but in terms of merchandise. The "paradox" just quoted emphasized the startling variation in gold values; upward, it is true, but for that reason the more ruinous, since the "commodity" is all too inadequate for its purpose; having been endowed by the international creditor with power to register the prices to which all else must conform, and to change those prices in his own interest "anywhere, any time, any place" with no right of appeal by prince or pauper. Hence, those controlling the gold supply control credit and therefore dominate the world.

Especial sympathy is extended to Mexico because silver's fall has prevented her "for the moment from carrying out her external obligations." Her domestic ones seem not to be important, an attitude which those immediately concerned may not appreciate. But the fact itself is not new to Mexico. Because of this fall she defaulted in her external obligations years ago. Since then she has compromised them and defaulted the compromise. Her troubles are chronic and conform to the time when the Mexican dollar began its flight from par to 50 cents in gold in London and New York. That value is now almost too low to estimate. She can not pay her obligations, and would be morally blameless if she declined to pay them at all until the constant decline in her material wealth, reflected in the descent of her dollar toward the zero point, shall have been arrested and restored by the same forces which caused it.

"What ails silver?" The answer is clear beyond all doubt. It has been legislated into bankruptcy in the interest and through the agency of the public creditor, who proposes to give it the final coup de grace with the aid of the Kemmerer Commission. The statement that it has been fighting a losing battle, reflected in the steadily declining trend of silver prices "since the discovery of America," is not true. Reliable tables from 1687 to date prove the contrary. Indeed, this writer never encountered the statement before. Not even the British coinage act of 1816 immediately affected its value. The credit for that belongs to the Federal statute of 1873, succeeding that of Germany in 1871. Then, contracts everywhere began to be made expressly payable only in gold or its equivalent. When our people permitted its financiers to thus stigmatize its own money, the price of silver began to decline.

Bimetallism is also challenged upon the ground that silver is relatively unimportant as a commodity, and its pending economic distress does not warrant its plea for relief. As to the first consideration, it should be sufficient to say as a mere commodity neither gold nor silver ever was of much consequence. Deprive gold of its money function, it would, like silver, lose the bulk of its demand and become a drug on the market. The vast bulk of the world's gold is precious only because of its place in the world of finance which rests wholly upon legislation, and which it maintains solely because its limited quantity restrains its undue expansion; which is true of no other metallic substance, silver alone excepted. (This statement of course takes no account of the very rare metals absorbed by the demands of industry.) Coupled with the persistent maintenance of their relative production through the centuries, this indeed is a remarkable phenomenon in history. Hence their primal selection for the symbols of exchange everywhere. To stress, therefore, the fact that the market value of the world's annual production of silver is far less than that of rubber, silk, cotton, etc., can not aid us at all in a solution of the problem. The production of silver was larger in 1929 and worth less in gold than ever before. When the metal was debased in 1872, the fact was defended on the assumption that its production had become unduly prolific. Now its relative worthlessness constitutes its principal offense.

Moreover, its decline in value compared with that in other raw material prices "entitles it to no hearing." This is amusing; since it has been common knowledge for half a century that silver being the money of more than half the world, is the index of its purchasing power, and that whatever affects its value is reflected in the market price of most basic commodities. This truism appeared in the tables of Jevons and Soetbeer as long ago as 1849 and 1885. Unless I am mistaken, this is an accepted economic fact, subject, of course, to the influence of temporary or unusual conditions either of local or general character. It follows that the decline in the prices of ordinary commodities is due in large degree to the fall in that of silver.

It is true that the use of silver in fractional currency has been impaired by reducing the silver in its coinage by most European countries or by supplanting it with other metals. This was largely due to the exigencies of the war, and it is gratifying to note that more recently these nations are restoring the coins to their normal ratio. The fact is of little importance in any event, for the malady is not seriously affected by it. Give the white metal its old prerogative and the values filched from it will take care of themscives.

It is interesting to note that the abnormal yield of gold from California and Australia in the sixth decade of the last century so alarmed Michael Chevalier that he attacked it as a monetary standard in 1857 in a brochure entitled "The Probable Fall in the Value of Gold." This greatly impressed Mr. Cobden, who translated and circulated it throughout Great Britain. Chevalier there anticipated all the arguments afterwards urged for the abandonment of the white metal. He alarmed England, which stabilized the prevailing values by compelling the Bank of England to purchase all gold offered for sale at the equivalent of $20.60 per ounce. On the other hand, several continental countries, notably Prussia and the Latin Union, were persuaded to establish the silver standard, which persisted until Germany began ridding herself of her silver after 1871. The Chevalier crusade was based upon an anticipated deluge of gold, which, like the subsequent fear of silver overproduction, did not and never will materialize.

But we are told that "the part played by silver in the war" should bar it from any special favors now. It is asking for none. Neither does it apologize for the tremendously important rôle which our despised "143 carloads of silver dollars" filled in the German war. The "unsavory" feature of the tale was its aftermath, and for that the Treasury Department must account, if it can.

The silver coinage of the United States consists of $539,962,000 in dollar units, and $118,619,000 in fractional currency; a total of $658,581,000. Except $93,162,000, all this money is and long has been in active circulation at par either in specie or in paper, the latter being expressly redeemable only "in silver dollars"; and it is not recorded that any one of them was ever dishonored in the Nation's exchanges.

Such was the situation when, in March, 1918, the Indian silver crisis confronted Great Britain, which plead for the purchase of $350,000,000 in ounces of silver. She could obtain it nowhere else and her need was dire. Should we have given it to her? She did not ask it. How then could we have replenished our store of domestic money? Should we have sold it at the market price of silver? It cost much more than that. How then should we have justified the deficit? We did the obvious thing, melted the dollars, sold the bullion at $1 per fine ounce to Great Britain and to our mint for fractional currency, and appropriated the proceeds to the purchase of an identical quantity of bullion at the same figure from American mines for recoinage in replacement of the melted dollars. We lost nothing and should have gained nothing by the transaction. But, in May, 1923, the Secretary of the Treasury, repudiated the law as to nearly 15,000,000 ounces sold to the mint, albeit he had previously ordered their purchase under the terms of the law which he then declared to be mandatory.

This incident was more than unsavory, it was dishonest; it netted the Treasury $14,589,730.13, contrary to the legislative intent. It is true that, then as now. the vaults of the Treasury "bulged with cartwheels," whose paper symbols were and are doing duty everywhere. It is equally true that then and now the same vaults also bulged with double eagles, supporting an active paper circulation. Then as now, vastly more silver than gold specie circulated among the people. Gold indeed has disappeared entirely from the exchanges. If silver accumulates in the Treasury vaults because the American public contemptuously spurns it, the same must be equally true of gold.

The opposition to the enactment of the Pittman Relief Act which is so graphically outlined comes to me with all the interest of a first-heard fairy tale. The attitude of the western Senators toward it differed not at all from that of their colleagues. It was outlined without dissent by the Committee on Mines and Mining, composed of members of both parties. It was unanimously reported for passage and as unanimously approved, after a very brief discussion which was entirely devoid of acrimony. A brief note of hostility, designed for political effect, was voiced in the House during the two hours devoted to its discussion, which neither received nor deserved the slightest notice.

The charge that in the administration of the act our Government spent approximately $210,000,000, not a dollar of which was necessary, is an amazing one in view of the fact that it is not true. The repurchase of silver thereunder cost the Government not one penny. Even the coin was melted at British expense. The arbitrary and reprehensible repudiation of the act by the department on February 11 and November 19, 1922, leaving the balance in the account just mentioned, is the only unsavory thing about it.

I have referred to the fact that following the armistice the oriental demand for silver sent its price skyward. In the fall of 1919, it reached the maximum figure of $1.40 per ounce, or 11 cents above the American ratio of 16 to 1. Ordinarily, this would have caused a movement of the metal to Asia. But its exportation was prohibited under penalty by the Espionage, Trading with the Enemy, and the Pittman Acts. Notwithstanding this fact, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board determined to break the booming silver market. The first two embargo acts were therefore lifted at the very time when they were needed, the third embargo having been overlooked or ignored. Then pretending our subsidiary coinage to be in danger of export, these officials on December 6, 1919, quietly contracted with the Asia, International, and Park Union Banking Corporations that "with the purpose to prevent the price of silver from rising above the point of exportation" (which point had been reached and passed several months before), agreed to "furnish" these banks not to exceed 20,000,000 silver dollars against current funds to be melted and used in Shanghai for that purpose, the net profits on the transaction to be turned over to the Federal Division of Foreign Exchange. The agreement was performed to the letter until mutually abandoned, when, after melting and dumping $13,000,000, the price of silver was forced to about 62 cents. The net profit on this nefarious transaction, $190,937.47, was duly paid to the Federal reserve banks. An additional 16,000,000 silver dollars was also melted for the same purpose through other agencies, but how or by whom has never been disclosed. I have asserted, and I repeat, that this transaction was not only unwarranted by but was entered into and consummated wholly without authority, statutory or otherwise. The silver coin "furnished" to the banks was part of a conspiracy to break a foreign market, the occasion was deliberately created for it, but the mandate of the Pittman Act against exportation was during all that time and still is the written law of the land.

A brief, matter-of-fact reference to this sinister incident, possibly half a page in length, appears in the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the Fiscal Year 1920 and apparently so framed as to escape attention. The scheme was, of course, a complete success. This great quantity of silver bullion, dumped into the oriental exchanges, carrying bullion silver to less than half its market price within the brief period of six months, stifled the reborn energies of oriental traffic, bankrupted many of its leaders and so disorganized its industries that the British Parliament, yielding to the consequent clamor of India, created the Indian currency commission of 1925 on whose recommendation the Indian Government struck the rupee from its fiscal system, forced its sudden fall from 60 to 30 cents the ounce, thus depriving 350,000,000 human beings overnight of half their purchasing power. I deliberately affirm that the recent India currency act was the immediate and logical result of our Treasury's lawless war upon silver in 1919–20, an episode as yet unknown to the vast majority of the American public. To add to this appalling calamity, comes the Kemmerer report of the Chinese commission and ostensibly designed to aid that unfortunate people in its hour of supreme industrial misery, which counsels it to abandon silver (as if it could), embrace the gold standard, and encircle the globe with its yellow symbol of industrial bondage. One wonders if the commission was not appointed for the purpose as the final act in that progressive state of misery to which the Orient has been committed since Rothschild reached the London Stock Exchange on that foggy morning after the Battle of Waterloo.

A prominent economist has just challenged the truth of what he calls the "gold-shortage fallacy," which can be barely referred to here. He may call it whatever he pleases, but he will hardly so characterize the increasing burden of debt, which is reflected in the decrease of commodity values everywhere. Gold may abound in New York and Paris, but when silver falls from 60 to 30 cents the ounce in less than a fortnight, thereby requiring twice as many commodities as before to liquidate a gold bond and England suspends specie payments, there is a ruinous shortage somewhere; and this is the crux of a situation which always develops with the extension of the single standard. It can develop but little further without catastrophe; as those who are "sitting on the lid" well realize.

Said Mr. Goschen, Chancellor of the Exchequer, in 1878 at Paris: "If, however, other states were to carry on a propaganda in favor of a gold standard and the demonetization of silver, the Indian Government would be obliged to reconsider its position and might be forced by events to take measure similar to those taken elsewhere. In that case, the scramble to get rid of silver might provoke one of the gravest crises ever undergone by commerce." This prophecy now being verified for the third time emphasizes the wise forecast of one of the wisest and greatest of British statesmen. And the center of that crises is now the British Empire so long the fortress of the gold-standard citadel.

Mr. Goschen well knew that all the silver and gold in the world would, if coined at the ratio of 15½ to 1, in his day fall below $15,000,000,000, as we know that it would not now exceed $25,000,000,000. Since his time, the volume of commerce and of credits have quadrupled. The amount is inadequate for the world's stock of primary money. The scramble to get rid of silver came soon after him and stays with us. Has the ensuing crisis measured up to his prophecy?

In conclusion, let me emphasize the outstanding fact that our country is and always was the advocate of bimetallism. For many years it enjoyed the system. It was never wholly away from it. On November 1, 1893, by what is now section 311 of the Revised Statutes, it solemnly declared it "to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals, and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts. And it is hereby further declared that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such a safe system of bimetallism as will maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States in the markets and in the payment of debts."

Unless that statute is a lie, unless it was a concession dishonestly given, it expresses the purpose and policy of the American people. As such it deserves their support until and unless the Congress in its wisdom shall otherwise declare.

PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD a letter sent to Senators by Hon. Ralph M. Shaw, counselor at law, of Chicago, on pending prohibition legislation, together with an extract from a letter sent by Mr. Shaw to correspondents in the South relating to the same subject matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letters referred to are as follows:

[Letter to Senators sent by Hon. Ralph M. Shaw, counselor at law, Chicago, on pending prohibition legislation]

NOVEMBER 17, 1931.

DEAR SENATOR: The inclosed clipping from the Chicago Tribune of this date tells its own story.

The article strikes a thoughtful man with terror. It not only indicates but it convinces one that this country is headed as fast as it can go along the same road which has brought England to the verge of financial ruin and which will complete its destruction within a few years.

The proposed boost in taxes, if it takes place, will shoulder onto between 2,000,000 and 2,500,000 out of a total of 130,000,000 citizens the entire burden of making up the deficit created by an extravagant Government. These 2,000,000 to 2,500,000 citizens compose the bone and sinew of the Nation. They are made up of earnest, hard-working professional or high-salaried men, who have little or no capital except their health, who take care of their own business and don't interfere with the business of others, and to destroy or discourage whom is to destroy and discourage the very element which the country needs for its continued success.

The very rich will not be burdened with the taxes. They have tax-exempt securities. The moderately well-to-do will pay little, if any, tax, and those millions of people who are protected by the great power of the Federal Government and who ought to contribute something at least to its support will be exempt from any contribution to their Government whatsoever.

It seems weird to me that instead of boosting taxes the Congress of the United States hasn't sufficient patriotism, courage, and intelligence to cut down expenses. As an illustration:

Why should citizens of New York and Chicago be taxed to furnish a water supply to the city of Los Angeles?

Why should high-salaried and professional men be taxed in order to loan money at lower than the prevailing rates of interest to the farmers' cooperative societies?

Why should the Farm Board function at all?

Why shouldn't the expenses of bureaus such as the Federal Trade Commission and the Interstate Commerce Commission be greatly reduced and their transcendent powers so fixed that instead of using them to throttle business they could do nothing other than preserve and aid it?

Of course, the ideal tax is a sales tax. Under such a tax the very rich, who buy a great deal, would pay the greater portion of taxes, and the very poor, who buy very little, would pay very little, if any, taxes; yet each would contribute to the Federal Government, which is supposed to protect and defend all citizens and not to exploit some citizens for the benefit of other citizens.

And just one more question:

Why shouldn't the Federal Government recede from its absurd position of calling beverages "intoxicating" which are not "intoxicating in fact," and levy such taxes as may be levied lawfully under the eighteenth amendment and thus make up its deficit out of a revenue from a business which it has been wholly incapable of stopping and which is now pouring more profits into the pockets of bootleggers than the entire income of the Federal Government from income taxes?

My dear Senator, I have been a Republican all my life; but if the Republican Party proposes an income tax upon what little there is left of the accumulated wealth of the country for the purpose of continuing the socialistic experiments by which some people are exploited for the benefit of others and declines to raise revenue which it might lawfully do from sources where it would not be felt—such as the taxation of alcoholic beverages which are not intoxicating in fact—it will surely ring the death knell upon itself not only in the campaign of 1932 but for the next quarter of a century.

I beg to remain very faithfully yours,

RALPH M. SHAW.

[Extract from a letter sent by Hon. Ralph Shaw, counselor at law at Chicago, to correspondents in the South]

DEAR SIR: I have your favor of November 14.

Since then I have read the article in Collier's to which you referred and which had previously escaped me.

While I know of no reason why an expression of my views can be of much special value, since I am not in public life, nevertheless, one is always more or less flattered to have one's views requested, and in the particular case I am glad to give them.

Although I have been a Republican all my life, I have about reached the conclusion that, owing to the combined effect of the wide-open split in the Republican Party in the North on the liquor question, as evidenced by votes in Massachusetts, New York, Connecticut, New Jersey, Ohio, and Illinois, and also to the existing economic depression and the dissatisfaction which has resulted therefrom, there is little, if any, chance for Republican success next autumn if the Democratic Party handles itself with any degree of cleverness.

As I have stated, in the North the prohibition question has ripped society wide open. Those of us who live in the larger and more populated sections know that unless the liquor traffic (which goes on just the same as it did before prohibition, except under cover, lawlessly and untaxed) is regulated, instead of being prohibited and untaxed, society will be destroyed.

The Democratic Party of the North knows this to be true, as evidenced by the many expressions of opinion not only of the voters but of its leaders.

It seems to me that the only thing which is essential for Democratic success next autumn is for the Democrats of the South to unite with the Democrats of the North on some compromise policy which:

(a) Will reassert the Jeffersonian principles of State rights;

(b) Will result in some amendment to the Constitution which can be supported by both elements of the party and will permit the liquor business to be taxed and regulated and the revenues now going to the bootleggers taken by the Government; and

(c) Then the nomination of a man who will inspire the confidence of millions of Republicans who are looking for a real business leader.

I do not know whether these views will meet with your personal approval or not, but it seems to me very sane and very logical for the Democrats to reassert their State-rights principles and to retake that which they so futilely surrendered in 1919.

CONSERVATION OF WILD LIFE

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed, and the calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 263) to insure adequate supplies of wild life, plant and animal, including forests, fish and game, for the people of the United States; to secure the correlation and most economical conduct of wild-life research and restocking and the elimination of duplication of effort and expense between the several departments of the Federal Government having to do with the same; to promote the development and extension of experimental stations for breeding; to promote studies of diseases and other factors limiting the natural supply; and for other purposes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I see that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], who introduced and reported this bill, is present, and I trust he will explain it.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill is to eliminate overlapping of effort and certain duplications of expenditures, and to consolidate, so far as possible, without any physical change in any department, the various efforts at conservation throughout the country of our wild-life resources, both mammals and fishes, and also our forests, in connection with which there has grown up through the years a great deal of duplication of effort.

The enactment of this bill will not cost the Government a cent. One of its chief objects is to save money, to eliminate waste, and to suggest rather than to order the various departments concerned with the conservation of our natural resources that they carefully consider what effect any project that comes under their purview or under their jurisdiction may have upon such natural resources.

Many times large enterprises have been undertaken by this or that department of the Government without due consideration of the question of the conservation of our natural resources. The purpose of the bill is to bring the attention of the various departments, chiefly the Biological Survey and the Bureau of Forestry of the Department of Agriculture, and the Department of the Interior, to the necessity at all times of considering and protecting these resources.

I very much hope that the bill will pass, because there is a large and a growing interest all over the country in this particular effort to save our natural resources.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WALCOTT. I yield.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, has this bill ever previously been before Congress?

Mr. WALCOTT. This bill has never been before Congress; it is a new bill; but it has been considered by the select Senate committee.

Mr. DILL. I have not had time to examine the bill with any care, and I should like to ask the Senator this question: Does the bill propose to authorize the appointment of additional game wardens or other Federal employees?

Mr. WALCOTT. No; it does not. It proposes no additional expenditure whatever and no additional personnel. The tendency of the bill, should it be enacted into law, should be to reduce somewhat the personnel, to reduce overlapping enterprises.

Mr. DILL. At whose instigation was this bill introduced?

Mr. WALCOTT. I do not think I understand the Senator's question.

Mr. DILL. In other words, what forces in the country are behind the bill?

Mr. WALCOTT. Various organizations are partially sponsors for it. It originated in the minds of the committee in cooperation with the various departments through the committee's effort to secure the facts pertaining to the conservation of wild life. By cross-questioning officials of the various departments chiefly concerned and by securing definite reports on this whole subject we found there were certain duplications of effort. Consequently we set to work in April last and devoted four months to the consideration of this whole subject with the heads of the various departments interested in the conservation of wild life. They sat in with us and they thoroughly approve the bill. The Izaak Walton League, the American Game Protective Association, and other associations interested in the conservation of wild life are very much interested in the passage of the bill, and believe that much good will come from its enactment into law.

Mr. DILL. I do not want to object to the bill or to make any fight against it; I am very much interested in the whole subject; but I think it is a bill of such magnitude and importance as to justify giving the Senate a little more time to examine it and find out just what it proposes to do.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WALCOTT. I do.

Mr. HAWES. I will say to the Senator from Washington that the Special Committee on Conservation of Wild-Life Resources has been making extensive investigation in various portions of the United States and has ascertained that there exists to-day a real emergency. Never before in our history have we been confronted with such a shortage of game as exists to-day.

This bill does not carry a dollar of appropriation; it does not put a single additional man upon the Government pay roll. All it does is to seek a coordination of effort between the present agencies of the Government so that they may work together in the effort to conserve the wild life of the country.

Our committee had before it the heads of every executive department of the United States Government having to do with the subject. They all approved this bill, and we are very anxious that it pass immediately, so that it may be given consideration on the House side. We should like to have it go over there at once. I assure the Senator from Washington that there is no particular force back of the bill. There is no objection to the bill. The bill is the thought of the five Senators on the Committee on Conservation of Wild-Life Resources.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAWES. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. Was the committee unanimous in its report?

Mr. HAWES. Not only is the committee unanimous but the heads of the various executive departments of the Government having to do with the subject are in favor of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I notice in the bill as reported that its first purpose is to lend trained men to State commissions for aid in the work of investigation. To what extent is that effort to be carried on?

Mr. HAWES. The Senator is now getting into a large subject.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that; but we ought to know whether we are going to have additional men put on the pay rolls. The Senator said there would be no appropriation required by this bill, but it is manifest if we lend trained men to State commissions that it will require a great many men for that purpose. Therefore the appropriations will be greatly increased. I was just wondering if the Senator from Missouri or the Senator who is chairman of the committee would tell the Senate just what the increase would amount to?

Mr. HAWES. In dollars and cents it will not amount to anything, because there is no appropriation in the bill, and none is required.

What the provision to which the Senator referred means is this: In the State of Tennessee there is a very able conservation commission, but, with its limited resources, it can not make a scientific study of the destruction by predatory animals and that sort of thing. The ultimate hope of this bill is that it will develop trained men who may be loaned temporarily to the State of Tennessee, and the colleges of Tennessee, for instance, to explain these different subjects. The bill, however, does not increase the personnel of the Government service one man nor does it call for a dollar of appropriation.

If the Senator would like to have an illustration of what it will do, I will tell him. Some years ago the Congress passed what is called the upper Mississippi wild life bill. The last Congress appropriated $90,000,000 for building dams and impounding the waters of the upper Mississippi River. By consulting with the Chief of Engineers we found that we could preserve the wild life and the fish life there by erecting six dams instead of one dam at a less cost to the Government. The conferences held between the Chief of Engineers and our committee were informal; but all in the world this bill proposes to do is to provide the machinery for exchange of ideas and discussion between the heads of the executive departments of the Government. I assure the Senator from Tennessee that there is no provision in the bill for any additional personnel.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator make it plain, please, whether in relation to cooperation with the States there is any invasion of the jurisdiction of the conservation departments of the States?

Mr. HAWES. There is none whatever.

Mr. President, I hope this bill may be passed.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I simply wish to indorse what has been said by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES]. I am a member of the committee which considered this subject, and I participated in the study of it. We now have a Bureau of Biological Survey, a Bureau of Fisheries, and so forth, and we have some very expert men in those branches of the service. They have studied not only animal diseases and destruction of wild life caused by predatory animals but they have studied also the raising of upland birds and matters of that kind, and they already have acquired a great deal of information that should be made available to the State commissions if they shall desire to use it. However, as has been stated, it is only on the invitation of the State commissions that the contemplated aid will be rendered. I can not conceive of any way in which the enactment of the bill will increase the cost to the Government; in fact, if there shall be a coordination between the Forest Service, the Park Service, the Biological Survey, and the Commissioner of Fisheries, not only should the work be performed more effectively but there should result a material reduction in cost.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I am sorry that I can not agree with the interpretation placed on this bill by the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES]. I want to call the attention of the Senate to section 8, for I propose to submit an amendment to strike out that section, which is a coercive measure, and will be very effective in its operations if it shall be adopted.

Section 8 is designed to coerce States into the adoption of laws dictated by a department in Washington, and it is proposed to be done by a sort of underhanded scheme; that is, appropriations shall not be used in any State under the terms of section 8 unless such State shall have enacted certain specific laws relating to the protection of fish and game demanded and dictated by the Federal Government. Section 8 means the surrender of the sovereignty of the State, of the right of the State to enact its own laws in the exercise of its police powers respecting the subject of fish and game. I think section 8 is as plain as the English language can make it. Section 8 provides that—

> Appropriations for the propagation of game and fish shall not be expended for stocking areas within any State in which, in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture with respect to game and fur-bearing animals, or the Secretary of Commerce with respect to fish, there are not adequate laws for the protection of such animals or fish.

Under that provision, if the Secretary of Agriculture or the Secretary of Commerce, in their opinion, conclude that there are not sufficient protective laws within a State, then that State is to be deprived of all appropriations under this bill.

Further, identically the same theory is carried out, only a little more vigorously. These appropriations for the propagation of game and fish shall not be expended—> in any State in which the Director of the Bureau of Biological Survey or the Commissioner of Fisheries or their duly authorized agents are not accorded full and free right to conduct such operations, and all operations necessary therefor, in such manner and at such times as is considered necessary and proper by the said heads of these bureaus or their agents.

Let us examine into the effect of that provision. For instance, take the Upper Mississippi Valley Wild Life Refuge, the States located within what is known as the Northwest Territory.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BLAINE. I do.

Mr. HAWES. Let me say to the Senator that if the section would do what he thinks it would do, I should be opposed to it; and, so far as I am concerned, it may be stricken out, because if there is any one thing that I do not want to advocate it is dictation of the Federal Government over the departments of the States.

Would it satisfy the Senator if section 8 were stricken out?

Mr. BLAINE. I see no particular objection to the bill if section 8 is stricken out; but I desire to conclude what I was about to say regarding the effect of this measure as applied to the States located in the northwest territory.

Under the Ordinance of the Northwest Territory those States are guaranteed certain rights respecting fishing, as binding upon the Federal Government as is any part of the Constitution. When the Government established the Upper Mississippi Valley Wild Life Refuge, the State of Wisconsin accepted that, reserving, however, coordinate power, concurrent power, reserving its rights under the Ordnance of the Northwest Territory, and reserving all other rights that were reserved by the respective States of Minnesota, Iowa, Illinois, and Missouri, if it affected Missouri.

Those rights ought not to be set aside, the guaranties under the Ordinance of the Northwest Territory ought not to be set aside, upon the judgment and the dictation of some subordinate official of the Federal Government; and yet, under section 8, if it were to become a part of the law of this land, we would at once have a contest on.

Moreover, that contest would be resolved in favor of the Federal Government before it began, because by this section the Federal Government says that not one dollar of appropriations shall be expended in that area for any of the purposes designed by the bill unless the State of Wisconsin and other States likewise situated surrender their sovereign power and the rights that are guaranteed to them; and as it affects that area it will affect every State in the Union—every one of them. They are not all likewise situated; but every State in the Union has its police power, and in the exercise of that police power it passes laws for the protection and conservation of wild life; and yet, if those laws do not meet with the approval of a Government official, the Government of the United States says that no money shall be spent within the boundaries of that State!

I shall not carry on this discussion further; but I think it is very clear that section 8 by all means should be stricken out, and I offer an amendment for that purpose.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I rise merely to ask a question of the Senator. What would happen if the Federal Government made appropriations and the States did not make like appropriations? What would be left of the bill?

Mr. BLAINE. I might suggest to the Senator that the bill is not designed as an aid to the States, and does not make appropriations to be met by the States; but no appropriation can be expended by the Federal Government in any State for any of the purposes set forth in the bill if, in the judgment of any of the departments or their agents, they decide that the laws of that State do not conform with their opinion of what the laws ought to be.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Could the Federal Government make appropriations to carry on the work that the Congress thought necessary?

Mr. BLAINE. The Federal Government, of course, can make an appropriation to carry on any appropriate undertaking on the part of the Federal Government; but——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Within the given State, say of Wisconsin?

Mr. BLAINE. But this section says that no such appropriation shall be expended in any State that does not conform its laws to the judgment of a Federal official.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But if section 8 is eliminated from the bill?

Mr. BLAINE. Then, of course, all of that is set aside.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Then the Federal Government could make appropriations to carry on conservation in a given State without the consent of the State?

Mr. BLAINE. No; then the bill would not deal with appropriations in any way whatever; but, as I understand, merely with coordination of the several departments. To that I have no objection.

I offer my amendment, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment can be offered at the proper time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I rise simply to address myself to the suggestion made that this bill involves no additional expense at all on the part of the Government. It is said that it carries no appropriation, which is true; but, of course, the most casual study of the bill will disclose to anyone that it will, as a matter of fact, add to the general expenditures of the Government, and that when the various departments come to present their estimates, if they desire to exercise the authority conveyed by this bill they will, of course, ask appropriations to carry out the authority thus conferred upon them.

For instance, in section 4:

Before any public works or other improvement project likely to affect wild life (including aquatic life, bird life, animal life, and plant life) is constructed, the project shall be referred to a board of inquiry—

That, of course, includes all rivers and harbors; it includes all reclamation work; it includes all flood-control work. That must be referred to the committee.

The project shall be referred to a board of inquiry—

Whose members shall be designated by the President, one each from the Bureau of Biological Survey, the Bureau of Fisheries, the Forest Service, and the National Park Service, and any other agency or establishment of the Government whose activities are or may be involved.

Thus, they are authorized to make inquiry.

Then the bill provides:

Such board shall investigate the project and submit its recommendations to the President, who shall have full authority to impose such restrictions in the construction of such project as he may deem desirable in the interests of wild-life conservation.

Of course, an appropriation will be necessary to carry out the authority thus conveyed. The board of inquiry will be obliged to send experts and students to look into the particular project on the ground, and to make a report; and all that, as a matter of course, involves more or less expense.

This is simply an authorization to the board of inquiry. The board of inquiry may deem it inadvisable to conduct any investigation. It may conduct it or it may not, as it sees fit. It is authorized to do it; but if it should do it—and usually, as Senators know, these boards expand—it necessarily involves no little expense.

Again, in section 5:

In the event that any department of the United States Government has for disposal any lands that are of no further use to such department for the purpose or purposes for which such areas were acquired or taken under administration, and if such lands are not required for other principal purposes by that or other departments, such areas shall first be offered to other various governmental agencies authorized by Congress to engage in the conservation of wild life, including fishes and forests, to ascertain if such areas are suitable and are desired to be taken under administration by such Federal conservation agencies to assist in carrying out the purposes of this act. Whenever such areas having been so offered shall upon investigation be found to be suitable for these purposes—

Which, of course, implies that an investigation of the particular purpose should be made for the purpose of determining whether steps ought to be taken to conserve wild life in connection with it.

I do not mean to say that all these things are not very desirable indeed. Indeed, I am in hearty sympathy with the idea of preserving the wild life of the country, and particularly of increasing it, so far as it furnishes food supplies to the people; but let us not deceive ourselves into the belief that this bill does not mean additional expenses to the Government.

Then you will find, all along down the list, that these surveys are to be made. Section 7:

The Bureau of Biological Survey and the Bureau of Fisheries are hereby authorized to make surveys of the wild-life resources of the public domain, or of any lands owned or leased by the Government, to conduct such investigations as may be necessary for the development of a program for the maintenance of an adequate supply of wild life in these areas, to establish game farms and fish-cultural stations commensurate with the need for replenishing the supply of game and fur-bearing animals and fish thereon, and, in cooperation with the National Park Service, the Forest Service, or other Federal agencies, the State agencies, to coordinate and establish adequate measures for wild-life control on such areas.

In these distressful times I rather regret this proposal thus to expand the powers and duties of these various departments of the Government.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, there are 13,000,000 men and women scattered through the 48 States who pay an annual license fee for the privilege of hunting and fishing; and the American public invests annually $650,000,000 in these forms of outdoor recreation.

I know the Senator from Montana is sympathetic with the general idea of this bill; and it may be well to explain how it would operate.

For instance, the Senator referred to flood control. Our Government has worked out two plans for relieving the flood waters in the lower Mississippi Valley. One involves a spillway of some 100 miles on one side of the river and another project involves a spillway of 125 miles on the other side of the river.

In that gigantic problem, involving some $300,000,000, all we are asking is that the Biological Survey and the Bureau of Fisheries shall consult and advise with the engineers as to the best way to proceed with the construction, but giving consideration to conserving wild life. That is all the bill is intended to do.

The Biological Survey and the Bureau of Fisheries have examiners now. They have their experts. They could tell just what animals and just what fish would prosper and grow in particular areas. All this bill is intended to accomplish is that the National Park Service, the Bureau of Fisheries, the Biological Survey, and the Interior Department shall, in making improvements and in spending Government money, consider the conservation of wild life.

That has not heretofore been done. The Bureau of Fisheries had under its jurisdiction one subject, the Biological Survey has another subject, the Bureau of Indian Affairs has another subject, and the Bureau of Engineers still a fourth subject. All this bill requires is that in considering these developments, and in spending Federal money, the wild-life resources of our country should be carefully considered.

Mr. President, our committee for long months this summer consulted with the head of every executive department in the Government. We have had long statistical reports. We have the result of our own investigations, and of the investigations of these departments. We do not believe this would cost an additional dollar. We believe, on the contrary, that it would be a Government economy, because the cooperation, the coordination, the explanation, and the exchange of opinion of these different departments will bring economy in service.

I may say, Mr. President, in perfect frankness, that we have another bill which may call for an expenditure of money for a great game farm, but that is not in this bill. All this bill intends to do is to secure a meeting of minds of the different departments of the Government and to have called to their attention the reckless waste of wild game and fish life in America.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I would like to ask the Senator this question: Is there anything now which prevents the department heads and the secretaries herein referred to, or their appointees, from conferring and doing the very things this bill authorizes them to do? This bill does not provide for the consolidation of anything. It just provides that they can cooperate. Can they not do that anyhow?

Mr. HAWES. These department heads met with our committee during the summer and, as the report shows very clearly, they cooperated very intelligently and very faithfully. But that is a voluntary cooperation. There is no instruction in the law, there is no directing force back of that cooperation. This bill simply proposes that they shall consult from time to time when these great projects arise.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will not this be the practical result of this bill, that after it becomes a law, with this statute directing the departments to cooperate, each department will want additional employees to take charge of this cooperation in these different departments? It is proposed that there be set up in each department a sort of wild life bureau, which will be entirely unnecessary, it seems to me, and will be an additional burden of bureaus upon the Government.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, we carefully avoided that. There is in the minds of the conservationists of the country the thought of one great department of conservation, under which all these branches would be united, either with a place in the President's Cabinet or an under secretary; but, as our report points out, the investigation of our committee has not reached that point where we believe we are justified in recommending a new department of that kind. In the meantime this bill would direct the heads of departments to the necessity of considering conservation in connection with public work.

Mr. President, we formerly had three months of duck shooting in the United States. We now have only one. We find that our black bass are disappearing and that our quail are disappearing. There is complaint from every commission of the 48 States about the game conditions and the fish conditions in the United States. All this bill is intended to do, and all, in my opinion, that it would do, would be to move the situation from voluntary cooperation to one where cooperation would be directed.

Mr. DILL. Let me call the Senator's attention to section 4:

> Before any public works or other improvement project likely to affect wild life (including aquatic life, bird life, animal life, and plant life) is constructed, the project shall be referred to a board of inquiry, whose members shall be designated by the President, one each from the Bureau of Biological Survey, the Bureau of Fisheries, the Forest Service, and the National Park Service, and any other agency or establishment of the Government whose activities are or may be involved.

The Senator is proposing to create a board here to pass on every dam that is to be built on any river in the United States. He is proposing to set up here another organization besides the Power Commission, for that matter, to pass on such questions.

May I ask the Senator this: Has there been any disposition on the part of the Power Commission not to regard wild life in the granting of licenses?

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, the difficulty has been that none of these commissions have given consideration to the subject of wild life in America. In our investigations we find that there is not a single department of the Government, there is not a single Cabinet officer, who does not in some way come in contact with the problem of conservation of wild life. This bill, for the first time officially, calls the attention of these departments to the necessity of cooperation. It would not result in stopping any public work; of course, no member of our committee would say that a great dam project should be endangered for the protection of fish or wild life of any kind. But it does call to the attention of these departments the fact that in considering these problems they should add to the practical, mechanical considerations the thought of conserving the wild life of the Nation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator states that this is the first attempt that has been made really to get cooperation in the conservation of wild life in America. I call the Senator's attention to the Budget report, pages 137 to 145, which shows that the President has recommended to the Congress for the coming fiscal year an appropriation of $1,794,710 for the conservation of wild life during the year, and it is proposed that there be set up 13 different bureaus in the Department of Agriculture for the purpose of conserving wild life in America for the coming year.

I want to call the Senator's attention to the very first act which was passed which provides especially for the very thing the Senator now argues this bill for the first time provides for. I read from page 137:

> For salaries and employment of labor in the city of Washington, * * * including cooperation with Federal, State, county, or other agencies or with farm bureaus, organizations, or individuals.

That first law sets up bureaus and provides for the payment of salaries in the sum of $83,135, of which $78,543 is for personal salaries, paid largely here in the District of Columbia.

Then there are 12 other bureaus set up here in the Department of Agriculture, just where this additional bureau will be set up later on if this bill passes, for the preservation of wild life, all of them having the very purpose set out in the Senator's bill.

Under those circumstances, where the administration has cut this appropriation for the conservation of wild life from $2,229,170 to $1,794,710, it seems to me that at such a time as this we should not come along and set up an additional bureau in the Department of Agriculture, and perhaps one in the Department of Commerce, and possibly one in the War Department.

I am in favor of the conservation of wild life, but just at this time, when we are spending $1,794,000 in the conservation of wild life, I think is an unfortunate time to add other bureaus and other departments to help do the same job these 13 bureaus are already doing.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, as a matter of fact, the Senator was reading the report of expenditures which have been going on for many, many years in the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; and this is just another bureau.

Mr. HAWES. There is no proposal to increase the Budget for next year. There will be a big decrease. We do not propose to create a single department of the Government. The Senator seems to be under the impression that we were proposing a very unusual appropriation this year, when, as a matter of fact, we are not. The Senator seems to be under the impression that we are creating new agencies, which we are not doing.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have been here a long time, and I happen to be a member of the Appropriations Committee, and know what I am talking about when I say that I have never known of a bill like this passing without this happening, that as soon as the bill becomes a law, in the consideration of the very next deficiency bill, a recommendation is made from the department, sent to us by the Executive, for an appropriation to carry out what is provided for in such a bill as this. I will say to the Senator that I believe that when we are now spending the enormous sum of $1,794,000 for the conservation of wild life in America, with men and women hungry in our country, we could let this bill go by for a little while. With 13 bureaus already established in the Department of Agriculture alone for this very purpose, it seems to me we might wait a little longer.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Missouri a question? The Senator from Tennessee says there are 13 bureaus doing this same work. Are there 13 bureaus engaged in the preservation of wild life?

Mr. HAWES. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hand the Senator from Idaho the 1933 Budget, and ask him to look for himself under the head of Biological Survey, on page 137, where he will see that there are 13 bureaus.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, the bill does not create a new bureau. The amount of money appropriated this year is less than the amount appropriated last year. The carrying out of the provisions of the bill will not cost a single dollar. That is the opinion of the five Senators who spent long, weary months investigating the matter. That is the opinion of the heads of the departments. It means simply a cooperation of effort, if you please, a correlation of effort.

Mr. President, before I yield the floor may I say that I had not intended to discuss this matter. It seemed simply a process of bringing together the minds of the heads of the different departments so that they could concentrate upon the subject. The bill does not propose to give them any new power, no power which they did not formerly possess. The only thing it does is to propose that when great public works are undertaken, consideration shall be given to the wild-life resources of that vicinity.

May I repeat that the American public spends some $650,000,000 a year in its outdoor recreation and that 13,000,000 men and women take out licenses for that purpose. There will be another measure presented by our committee which will call for an appropriation of money, and I hope that bill will be considered and discussed upon its merits. But there is not in the bill now before us anything that extends the activities of the departments or that extends their jurisdiction or extends the personnel of the Government. All it does is to ask that they shall sit together in conference when public enterprises are undertaken and give thought to the subject of wild-life conservation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COUZENS in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Perhaps the objection I have raised can be obviated by a simple amendment which would provide that under no condition shall any additional appropriation be made for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the bill or any part of it. If that language is put in the bill, we can easily come to a conclusion about it.

Mr. HAWES. That is the thought back of the bill, that it shall not cost any additional money.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me inquire of the Senator from Missouri whether the first process under the bill will not be to establish a board of inquiry, under the provisions of section 4? When that board of inquiry is established, of course, it will have to keep a record of its proceedings. It will have to have an executive secretary to keep a record to tell what the board did, what its resolutions have been, and what its course of action has been. That means an office force. Whenever a public work is contemplated or is under process, an investigation must be made, and the board of inquiry must have the necessary force with which to carry on the investigation. How can it be done without an additional expenditure?

Mr. HAWES. I do not anticipate there will be any additional expense. As a practical illustration, take one of the great projects that we know of, the spillway in the Mississippi Valley. All that would be necessary to do would be to have the Biological Survey, on the one side, and the Bureau of Fisheries, on the other side, report to whoever is undertaking that work for the Government that this kind of construction would be helpful and that kind of construction would be harmful.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But let us take the first proposition. When the board of inquiry is created, will it not be necessary to have a secretary who will have charge of the records of the board, for instance, and keep an account of what it does? Will it not likewise be necessary to have some one sent out to make the inquiry contemplated by the provisions of the bill?

Mr. HAWES. The agency is there now to make the inquiry.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I have not had time to read the bill very carefully, but there are some things which at the first reading seem to me to be very important to our part of the country. The bill provides:

> Hereafter, whenever any dam is authorized to be constructed either by the Federal Government itself, or by any private agency under Government permit, the Bureau of Fisheries shall be consulted and before such construction is begun or permit granted, when deemed necessary, due and adequate provision shall be made for the migration of fish life from the upper to the lower and from the lower to the upper waters of said dam by means of fish lifts, ladders, or other devices.

Does the bill go any further than simply to provide that the Bureau of Fisheries shall be consulted with reference to the manner of preserving the fish in the reservoir?

Mr. HAWES. That is all. It is not compulsory.

Mr. BORAH. They do not have any authority to stay the building of a dam?

Mr. HAWES. No. At the present time it is not even their duty to call attention to the matter.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I invite attention to section 4 of the bill, under which the President is required to appoint a separate commission to pass on that question. It provides that the President may impose restrictions as the result of that investigation.

Mr. BORAH. Section 4 of the bill reads as follows:

> SEC. 4. Before any public works or other improvement project likely to affect wild life (including aquatic life, bird life, animal life, and plant life) is constructed, the project shall be referred to a board of inquiry, whose members shall be designated by the President, one each from the Bureau of Biological Survey, the Bureau of Fisheries, the Forest Service, and the National Park Service, and any other agency or establishment of the Government whose activities are or may be involved. Such board shall investigate the project and submit its recommendations to the President, who shall have full authority to impose such restrictions in the construction of such project as he may deem desirable in the interests of wild-life conservation.

That raises the question as to whether or not the project shall go forward.

Mr. HAWES. I invite the Senator's attention to the language on page 3, section 3, where we have inserted this qualifying provision: That none of the recommendations shall be "inconsistent with the primary use of the waters and/or the constitutional rights of the States."

Mr. BORAH. Where is that language to be found?

Mr. HAWES. On page 3 of the bill. If further language is required to make that clearer, I have no objection.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In response to a recent question from me the Senator gave me his opinion that there is no invasion of the jurisidiction of State conservation authorities in the bill. May I ask whether the authority described in section 8, which seems to give the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Commerce a right of veto upon appropriations by the States, is an existing power or a new one?

Mr. HAWES. It is a policy or regulation, as I understand it, that has always been observed in the past. But, as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] has raised the question that this may confer some arbitrary power in the Federal Government over the States, so far as our committee is concerned—I have not conferred with all of them, but I believe they will agree—section 8 may be stricken out.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think that would be wise under the circumstances.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I would like to offer an amendment if it is in order.

Mr. DILL. There is an amendment pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] is pending, to strike out section 8.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I offer an amendment to lie on the table and be called up at a later time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That may be done.

Mr. McKELLAR. I propose to amend the bill, on page 7, line 9, by striking out the period after the word "act" and inserting a semicolon and the following language:

> Provided, That no authority is given in this bill for setting up any additional bureau or division in any department or commission, and shall not authorize any additional appropriation for carrying out its purposes.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I should like to offer an amendment and have it pending. I move, on page 4, lines 14 to 16, inclusive, to strike out section 4, in the following language:

SEC. 4. Before any public works or other improvement project likely to affect wild life (including aquatic life, bird life, animal life, and plant life) is constructed, the project shall be referred to a board of inquiry, whose members shall be designated by the President, one each from the Bureau of Biological Survey, the Bureau of Fisheries, the Forest Service, and the National Park Service, and any other agency or establishment of the Government whose activities are or may be involved. Such board shall investigate the project and submit its recommendations to the President, who shall have full authority to impose such restrictions in the construction of such project as he may deem desirable in the interests of wild-life conservation.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether it is the intention to proceed to-day with the consideration of the bill to its conclusion?

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I am perfectly agreeable to letting the bill go over until to-morrow, providing it does not lose its place on the calendar.

Mr. KENDRICK. I hope the Senator will do that, because I wish to offer an amendment to the bill and would like an opportunity and time to prepare it.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the parliamentary situation is that under objection the bill will go over unless a motion is made to make it the unfinished business.

Mr. DILL. I understand not to-day.

Mr. McNARY. I am very sure of my position. In any event, if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] desires, he can ask unanimous consent that the bill go over without losing its place.

Mr. WALCOTT. I submit that request.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I understand that section 8 has already been stricken out. Has that amendment been agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRATTON in the chair). That amendment is the pending question.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understood the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] to say that the committee was agreeable to having it stricken out, so we might as well dispose of that now.

Mr. McNARY. I think the whole matter should go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request submitted by the Senator from Connecticut that the bill go over without losing its place? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

INTERGOVERNMENTAL INDEBTEDNESS

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to discuss the subject of the proposed Hoover moratorium. Some years ago, and extending over quite a period of time, what are known as the foreign debts were settled by a Debt Funding Commission composed of the then Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hoover; former Senator Burton, of Ohio; the then Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes; the senior Senator from Utah, Mr. SMOOT; and the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon. So far as I can recall, these gentlemen composed the membership of the commission when the debts were really settled. That commission finally settled the debts known as foreign debts owing to this country by virtually canceling the entire war debt. I believe some time after its organization, Messrs. CRISP, of Georgia, and Olney, of Massachusetts, were added to the commission.

Mr. President, the various debts that were owed to us by our allies were incurred for two purposes. The first purpose was for them to carry on the war. After the war was over they again borrowed money from us for the purpose of rehabilitating their several countries. The substance of what our Foreign Debt Commission did, as I shall more specifically point out in a moment, was to cancel the war debts and leave the postarmistice or commercial debts to be paid over a period of 62 years, the debtors paying some principal and some interest each year.

Mr. President, last June a propaganda campaign was started in this country for the purpose of bringing about a moratorium. That campaign was started by the President of the United States, Mr. Hoover. He stated the other day in his message to Congress that it was done by his initiative. Foreign nations owe us enormous sums of money. They had been paying us regularly; the debts had been adjusted to their satisfaction; none of them was complaining of those debts, so far as the general public knew. Not a single proposal on the part of any foreign nation, so far as I ever heard, had been advanced for a moratorium or for the cancellation of its debts; such a proposal had not been made to our Government; but, like a bolt out of a clear sky, the President announced that he had arranged a moratorium, that he had polled the Senate and the House of Representatives, and that he had found that a majority of Congress favored a moratorium as he favored it.

In the first place, Mr. President, I want to say that that is a new method of legislation in our Government. Under our Constitution the President has the initiative in all matters in our foreign relations, of course; but before an agreement can be made with a foreign government, it is necessary either to have the sanction of the Senate or to have the sanction of both Houses of Congress by legislative action.

If the President had wanted Congress to cooperate with him and to ratify the moratorium he had suggested, the legal way to have done it, the constitutional way to have accomplished that purpose would have been to call Congress in session and have it ratify what he had done as our representative in dealings with foreign nations. That course, however, was not pursued by him, but the statement was printed in the newspapers that a majority of both Houses thought the moratorium ought to be granted. I apprehend that that statement is correct. How correct it is I can not say. I have seen the figures resulting from the so-called poll, but I do not recall exactly what they are.

Now, Mr. President, I want to ask what is the real reason behind this proposed moratorium? So far as the public knew, no foreign government had asked for a moratorium. The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has offered a resolution asking for an investigation of the matter, and I want to say that I think that is a desirable step, and the Senator from California deserves the thanks of the taxpayers of this Nation for his timely act; for whatever else may be said, whatever may be the reason for the moratorium or for any of the subsequent steps that have been taken about it, the effect of the moratorium and the effect of those subsequent steps will be an entering wedge to the cancellation of the foreign debts that are due us, and according to the highest authority, Mr. Mellon, whose own words I shall quote in a few moments, and who was a member of the Debt Funding Commission, whenever those debts are canceled or partially remitted, it will to that extent mean a removal of tax burdens from foreign taxpayers and the placing of those tax burdens on the backs of the American taxpayers.

My objection to the moratorium is that the method of its accomplishment by the President is unknown to the American Constitution and to the American system of legislative action.

Mr. President, in my humble judgment, there never was a more inopportune time for the American Government to cancel, in whole or in part, these already compromised debts due us by foreign governments. With our Treasury already $1,700,000,000 "in the red," with over 6,000,000 of our people out of employment, with business gone awry, with many of our great financial institutions failing, with people harder up financially in this country than perhaps ever before in our history, it seems to me to be a wholly inopportune time to take tax burdens from the backs of the people of other nations, who justly owe us, and impose those burdens on the already overburdened taxpayers of this Nation. I want, as one Representative in this body, to protest against such action.

What is the purpose of this moratorium? I take it that when the committee, of which the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is a member, shall report, it will go more accurately into that question, but I want to suggest what I believe is the purpose.

Mr. President, since the war our international bankers have loaned enormous sums of money to European nations. I saw in one newspaper where our private bankers, international bankers, wholly apart from the debt that Germany may owe this Government, had loaned to German citizens or corporations or municipalities something like $3,000,000,000. They loaned this money with their eyes wide open. They knew these national debts existed. They loaned it for purely private gain. They loaned their private money all over Europe, and then when Europe got hard up, when prosperity was no longer there, or these gentlemen thought it was no longer there, the gentlemen who have been loaning their money in foreign countries wanted to get it back; they wanted to be certain that it would be repaid; and they saw, as I believe, that the Government obligations of foreign countries to the United States were standing in their way. What did they do? They immediately started a propaganda for the cancellation of the national foreign debts due us. Their first plea was that it would make other people feel more kindly toward us, that it would put those foreign nations in a good humor toward us. Another plea was that it would increase our foreign trade, that it would give these foreign countries some money with which to trade with us. The idea of submitting an argument like that, when we have such a high tariff wall around our country that foreign nations are virtually prohibited from trading with us.

It could not be that reason. So what is the reason? It seems to me that there can be but one reason, and that reason is that our international bankers want to put the debts due them ahead of the debts due the Government of the United States.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield in just a moment. They want the debts which foreign governments owe us canceled, so as to make the payment of their own private debts assured.

None of these international bankers are hungry. None of them are starving. None of them are without clothes or without shoes. For the most part they are living in luxury still, and will continue to do so, even if this enormous indebtedness is not canceled for their benefit.

To cancel this indebtedness for their benefit, while millions of men and women are without employment in this country, some of them hungry, would be little short of criminal, and I do not believe the Congress will ever agree to it.

I have no quarrel with the international bankers; I presume they are doing just what anyone self-interested as they are would do; I am not blaming them for the course which they take; but, as a representative of all the people, I want to say it seems to me that the rights of all the people should be protected as well as the rights of international bankers, and that these debts owing to our Government, owing to all the people collectively, should not be canceled in the interest of the better security of these private debts.

Mr. President, there has been a great deal said about a dole. I wish to say, right at the outset, that I am opposed to the dole system; I think England made a great mistake when she adopted the dole system; but if our international bankers can get their debts secured and paid in full by the cancellation of all the billions of dollars of public indebtedness that foreign nations owe to us, why is not that a dole to the international bankers? Not only is it a dole, but it is the most monstrous dole that was ever given by any government in the history of all time!

It is true that some newspapers have suggested that the reason the President was so insistent upon a moratorium and another debt-funding commission was that he was more interested in foreign nations than he was in America. I do not take any stock in that view. While I do not speak for President Hoover, of course, I do not believe he is more interested in any other government than he is in America; but I do believe that those who want these debts canceled for selfish reasons have interested Mr. Hoover in their behalf. At all events, he certainly takes their view and is working strenuously to put it into effect.

I first want to speak of the Debt Funding Commission and just how debts were funded. There are some foreign nations that call our Government "Uncle Shylock." I want to say, after a very careful examination of the facts, that America has acted more generously, more splendidly generously, than any nation has ever acted in regard to a financial transaction in all history.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish the Senator would also add that the Government of the United States has acted more generously than any other nation will ever act in a similar condition in the days to come.

Mr. McKELLAR. In my judgment, that is true. As I shall point out in a moment, we canceled all the war debts; we merely asked our foreign debtors to pay the commercial debts which were due us, and not even all of them. I want to take them up somewhat in order. I am going to refer only to four nations; the others are smaller and need not be mentioned.

The first one I desire to refer to is France. According to the report of the Debt Funding Commission, of which my distinguished friend across the aisle, the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], was a member, France owed to us at the end of the war more than $4,000,000,000. Let me get the figures. I want to have no mistake about them, Mr. President. The report gives it as $4,025,000,000, on page 329.

Substantially all of France's war debts were canceled. All of Italy's war debts were canceled, and nearly half of her post-war debts were canceled. Belgium and other small nations were treated quite as well. That settlement left the war debts of all nations canceled except the so-called war debts of Great Britain; and when we come to examine the debts of Great Britain we find that all of her actual war debts were canceled, too, as I shall point out in a moment. I am sure the senior Senator from Utah will agree with me in that statement.

OFFICIAL FIGURES AS TO DEBTS OF PRINCIPAL EUROPEAN COUNTRIES TO THE UNITED STATES GROWING OUT OF THE WORLD WAR

BELGIUM

Total indebtedness refunded (act of April 30, 1926), $417,780,000.

Of the foregoing, $246,000,000, in round numbers, represents post-war advances. On page 168 of its Combined Annual Reports the World War Foreign Debt Commission said:

Repayment of the postarmistice debt, amounting at date to about $246,000,000, has been arranged on the general lines accorded to other countries.

FRANCE

Total indebtedness refunded (act of December 18, 1929), $4,025,000,000.

Of the foregoing, $1,655,000,000 represents postwar advances. On page 272 of the report Secretary Mellon, under date of July 16, 1926, made the following statement:

For obligations incurred by France to America after the war ended, France owes us to-day $1,655,000,000. The present value of the entire French-American settlement, at the rate of interest carried in France's existing obligations, is $1,681,000,000. In effect, therefore, America has canceled the obligations of France for all advances during the war, and France in the Mellon-Berenger agreement has undertaken only to repay the advances and obligations subsequent to the armistice. No other creditor of France has accorded such generous treatment.

ITALY

Total indebtedness refunded (act of April 28, 1926), $2,042,000,000.

Of the foregoing, $616,869,197.96 represents post-war advances. On page 233 of the report the House Committee on Ways and Means, in reporting the debt settlement, says:

Of this total indebtedness $1,030,000,000 was loaned before the armistice and $616,869,197.96 after the armistice.

GREAT BRITAIN

Total indebtedness refunded (act of February 28, 1923), $4,600,000,000.

Of the foregoing, $581,000,000 represents post-war advances. On page 299 of the report a Treasury Department statement under date of July 20, 1926, says:

The total principal advances to England after the armistice were $581,000,000.

The same statement includes an item of $261,643,388.81 spent by Great Britain in the United States for silver, and further says:

Of this amount—

The amount of $5,366,000,000 mentioned in the statement—

$1,682,000,000 represents "exchange and cotton purchases." The greater part of this expenditure was for the maintenance of sterling exchange, not necessary for purchases in America, but which enabled England to make purchases in other countries at an undepreciated exchange rate; $2,643,000,000 was for food and tobacco. A part of this item is probably included in the account out of which England was reimbursed by the other allies and a part was resold by England to its own civil population.

In a letter from Secretary Mellon, found on pages 302–306 of the report, he says (p. 304):

Let us see what relation the burden of our debt settlements bears to our loans after the armistice. * * * In the case of England, postarmistice advances with interest amounted to $660,000,000, and the present value of the entire debt settlement is $3,297,000,000. It must be remembered that England borrowed a large proportion of its debts to us for purely commercial as distinguished from war purposes—to meet its commercial obligations maturing in America, to furnish India with silver, to buy food to be resold to its civilian population, and to maintain exchange. Our loans to England were not so much to provide war supplies as to furnish sterling for home and foreign needs and to save England from borrowing from its own people.

France's after-the-war indebtedness with interest amounts to $1,655,000,000. The settlement negotiated by Ambassador Berenger with the American Debt Funding Commission has a present value of $1,681,000,000.

Belgium's postarmistice borrowings with interest were $258,000,000, and the present value of the settlement is $192,000,000. * * *

With Italy the situation is similar. Its postarmistice indebtedness with interest is $800,000,000, and the present value of its debt settlement is $426,000,000. * * * In view of these facts, in what respect do you still believe America has been unfair to its allies? [Answering a criticism made by a correspondent in a letter to the President.]

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know whether or not the Senator plans to refer to the indebtedness of France in this connection.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I do.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will allow me for just a moment, in the settlement of the war debts with France we also included a debt that she owed for the purchase of American goods that were in France at the close of the war. She settled with us on the basis of $407,000,000 for over two billions of American products. That was included and put in the obligation known as the war debts, or money that was advanced to her during the war and after the war.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I will also say to the Senator that there was more money advanced to France after the war than there was before the close of the war.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, of course. Not only that, Mr. President, but under the act passed by the Congress in furtherance of the commission's report we did but about collect the postwar indebtedness of France. I want to read from the record for a moment.

These statements are made on the highest authority, Mr. President—the authority of Mr. Mellon and Mr. Hoover and Mr. Smoot and the other members of the commission when the then cancellations were being entered into.

I quote from Mr. Mellon's statement of July 16, 1926, in behalf of the World War Foreign Debt Commission, page 272 of the combined reports of that body. Mr. Mellon said:

The American settlement with France embraces all of France's indebtedness, and represents, in the opinion of the American commission, France's capacity to pay. For obligations incurred by France to America after the war ended, France owes us to-day $1,655,000,000. The present value of the entire French-American settlement, at the rate of interest carried in France's existing obligations, is $1,681,000,000. In effect, therefore, America has canceled the obligations of France for all advances during the war, and France in the Mellon-Berenger agreement has undertaken only to repay the advances and obligations subsequent to the armistice. No other creditor of France has accorded such generous treatment.

And yet there are people in this country who talk about its being a true statement that the American Government is a Shylock and that it has acted as a Shylock toward France! These figures show how unjust such statements are.

I now quote from Mr. Mellon on Italy, July 14, 1926, page 304 of the report already referred to:

With Italy the situation is similar. Its postarmistice indebtedness with interest is $800,000,000, and the present value of its debt settlement is $426,000,000.

In other words, Mr. President, the facts reported by the Debt Funding Commission, reported by the President himself and by the Secretary of the Treasury and by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], show that we canceled Italy's debt, and then virtually divided the postarmistice debt in half, and arranged for her to pay the last half of the postarmistice debt in 62 years.

Mr. Mellon goes on to say:

It is the same as regards Serbia. In view of these facts—

Says Mr. Mellon—

in what respect do you still believe America has been unfair to its allies?

America has not been unfair to her allies. She has already been marvelously generous to her allies.

It will thus be seen that according to Mr. Mellon we not only canceled the Italian war debt, but we canceled $374,000,000 in addition to her war debt for the purpose of reestablishing her country and probably giving her the money to pay her soldiers a cash bonus, as we did with France, as we did with Great Britain, as we did with practically every other one of our allies.

Mr. President, we declined to pay our own soldiers a cash bonus, but we furnished to our allies the money to pay their soldiers a cash bonus after the war was over; and yet people talk about America being ungenerous and speak of our Government as "Uncle Shylock."

As to Belgium, Mr. Mellon, on page 304, says:

Belgium's postarmistice borrowings with interest were $258,000,000, and the present value of the settlement is $192,000,000.

Nearly a third removed!

Nearly a third canceled!

Mr. SMOOT. Forty-one per cent, as I remember.

Mr. McKELLAR. Forty-one per cent, as the Senator from Utah says.

In addition Belgium has a share of the German reparations sufficient to pay her prearmistice debt to America.

Belgium was treated with the greatest leniency.

Thus we find that we not only canceled Belgium's war debt but we canceled $66,000,000 of her after-the-war debt; and now it is proposed by two—or shall I say three as I look at Senator SMOOT?—of the members of that very debt funding commission further to cancel and cut down these debts!

I stop here long enough to read the Senate a statement made by Mr. Mellon. I desire to say here that I do not indorse all of Mr. Mellon's statements—far from it—but here is one that I indorse absolutely.

I quote from page 422 of the report heretofore referred to. Listen to this. What a splendid rule of conduct it is for the Senate to-day and for the Congress to-day!

Public officials—

Says Mr. Mellon—

Whether in the legislative or executive branch of the Government, are essentially trustees. They are trustees for the citizens of their own country.

A strange doctrine in these later days!

They are trustees for the citizens of their own country. They are not free to give away the property of the beneficiaries of the trust. An individual can do what he will with his own property. A public official, however, must keep firmly in view that he is dealing not with his own property but with the property intrusted to his care by the citizens of his country.

I also quote the following from Mr. Mellon.

On July 14, 1926, Mr. Mellon said (p. 305 of report of Debt Funding Commission):

When cancellation of debts is viewed from the standpoint of the United States, you fail to recognize that the Debt Commission, the President, and the Congress act, not in their individual capacities according to sentiment, but as trustees for those whom they represent, the American people. If these foreign debts are canceled the United States is not released from its obligation to pay the very bonds which were sold to our citizens to make the advances to the foreign governments. We must collect through taxation from our people if our debtors do not pay to us what they can.

Mr. President, let me say here that in dealing with these foreign debts—already as a whole pared down more than 50 per cent by the Debt Funding Commission, already dealt with in the most generous fashion—I want to ask each Senator and, if I may, each Congressman to remember Secretary Mellon's words when he says that we must keep firmly in view the fact that we are not dealing with our own property, but we are intrusted by the citizens of this country with their property, and we should deal with it as trustees. We have no moral right to give it away. We have no moral right to cancel it.

Again, says Mr. Mellon:

Moreover, those who urge a complete forgiveness of debts ignore entirely the effect upon the country whose debt is forgiven. All self-respecting people desire to discharge their obligations. This is true of nations as of men. It is true of France.

And I think it is true of all these nations, Mr. President. I want to say that I admire the self-respecting spirit, the sincerity, and the honesty of these foreign nations, having had all their war debts canceled, when they decline to ask for further cancellation of these debts. All honor to them! They are looking after the interests of their own people. It is our duty to act as trustees for our people in dealing with these great interests. I believe they will pay these just debts. I believe they want to pay these honest debts, money borrowed after the war to rehabilitate their countries.

I want to quote Mr. Mellon again on the subject of what happened.

In a public statement of May 5, 1927, about the British Government's offer to cancel, Mr. Mellon, among other things, said (p. 631):

By implication this means that should the United States further reduce British obligations to the United States, the British Government would cancel a like amount of obligations due to it from its debtors. It is very obvious that the British Government would neither lose nor gain in such a transaction. The United States Government is, however, in a very different position. The British Government is both creditor and debtor. The United States Government is a creditor only; and every dollar of debt canceled by the United States represents an increase by just that amount of the war burden borne by the American taxpayer.

No statement could be straighter or truer than that statement at this time. I hope my brother Senators will remember, when called upon either to vote on this moratorium or to vote on the reestablishment of the Debt Funding Commission or to vote on the cancellation of any of these debts, that whenever they vote to cancel them in whole or in part they are simply taking away the tax burdens of foreign nations which honestly, justly, and fairly owe these debts and putting those burdens upon the taxpayers of America. Of all times under the sun for putting additional tax burdens on the American people, to my mind, this is the poorest time that could ever be selected.

Mr. President, I said that, taking the debts as a whole, we canceled the war debts of all these countries. Apparently, an exception should be made to that statement in the case of Great Britain; but when we come to look into it, Senators, we find that exactly the same thing is true of Great Britain. I say so upon the authority of the Debt Funding Commission and upon the authority of Mr. Mellon, who was the real head of it.

It is but fair to say that the settlement with Great Britain was the best settlement that the American commission made, it being, as I recall, 66 per cent of the value of the British debt to us. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think it is a little more than that. As I remember, taking the rate of interest at 3 per cent for the first 10 years and 3½ per cent thereafter, and taking that as a fair basis of interest—and at that time it was, on our bonds—England agreed to pay us about 82 per cent of the value of the debt.

Mr. McKELLAR. But its cash market value at that time——

Mr. SMOOT. I mean under those conditions.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is correct about the situation under the conditions he stated, but the fair cash market value of the indebtedness was about 66 per cent, which was more than the Debt Funding Commission collected from any other country, and it is fair and right to say that at this place.

There was a reason for the agreement, however, and that reason was specifically stated by Mr. Mellon at the time, for collecting that much money from Great Britain; and I now propose to give the reason. I quote from page 304, from Mr. Mellon's statement:

In the case of England, postarmistice advances with interest amounted to $660,000,000.

It will be remembered that the whole debt was in the neighborhood of four billion, so it is manifest that the remainder of the debt over the $660,000,000 was not canceled, and therefore, in one sense, it could be said that all her war debt was not canceled. But listen to Mr. Mellon:

It must be remembered that England borrowed a large proportion of its debts to us for purely commercial as distinguished from war purposes—to meet its commercial obligations maturing in America, to furnish India with silver, to buy food to be resold to its civilian population, and to maintain exchange.

As I recall it, and if I am wrong I hope some Senator will correct me, because I do not want to make a statement that is not correct, Great Britain had been borrowing from private sources in America very large sums before we entered the war, at very high rates of interest, and some of this money was used to pay those loans. Senator JOHNSON will no doubt ascertain this fact accurately. But Mr. Mellon says it was used "for purely commercial purposes, to meet its commercial obligations maturing in America, to furnish India with silver." It will be remembered that a very large portion of the money borrowed from us was used for that purpose, and it was a very proper purpose; I am not complaining of the purpose at all.

To buy food to be resold to its civilian population.

That was not a war purpose.

To maintain exchange.

Very large sums were used for that purpose.

Finally Mr. Mellon says:

Our loans to England were not so much to provide war supplies as to furnish sterling for home and foreign needs and to save England from borrowing from its own people.

The statement of Mr. Mellon there and in regard to these other debts tells the whole story. America has generously, more than generously, canceled every war debt of her allies, and what the foreign nations want now, and what President Hoover seems so insistent upon, is the cancellation of the commercial debts—money loaned for the purpose of rehabilitating those countries. Some of them even used the money, we were told, in building up great armies and navies, for paying cash bonuses to their soldiers, and even for lending other nations to build up armaments.

Mr. President, I have taken the trouble to prepare for the Senate a statement of some of the borrowings after the armistice. I am not going to read them all, but let us take those to France. The armistice was signed on the 11th day of November, 1918. On November 15, four days later, the proper officer of France applied to our Treasury and received $40,000,000. Other amounts were borrowed, as follows:

Dec. 10	$71,427,000
Dec. 23	5,000,000
Dec. 26	10,000,000

1919

Jan. 25	10,000,000
Jan. 28	81,050,800
Feb. 13	10,000,000
Feb. 20	5,000,000
Feb. 21	5,000,000
Mar. 4	10,000,000
Mar. 6	20,000,000
Mar. 11	30,000,000

It was almost a daily transaction.

Mar. 13	$10,000,000
Mar. 14	10,000,000
Mar. 18	20,000,000
Mar. 20	10,000,000
Mar. 25	15,000,000
Mar. 27	10,000,000
Mar. 31	85,000,000

Then April 1—they did not pass the 1st of April—$15,000,000.

Apr. 3	$10,000,000
Apr. 8	10,000,000
Apr. 10	10,000,000

They seemed to have forgotten something, and borrowed $40,000,000 on the 15th of April.

April 22	$20,000,000

April 24, 1919, six months after the war was over, $20,000,000.

Apr. 29	$10,000,000
May 6	10,000,000
May 8	10,000,000
May 15	15,000,000
May 20	10,000,000
May 29	10,000,000

Let us see what that amounts to per month. That was $55,000,000 during the month of May. That was doing pretty well. I do not think Uncle Sam ought to be called "Uncle Shylock" when we thus generously dealt with one of our former allies!

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply want to say this, that I know of no law ever passed by Congress authorizing those advances on the dates on which the money was advanced. Those advances were after the close of the war, and I know of no legislation which authorized the Government of the United States to make those advances after the close of the war.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will have to look that up. I am sure there was full legal authority.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. There was a definite authorization, and I am astonished that the chairman of the Finance Committee of the United States Senate was not aware of it.

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to have the Senator from Virginia point to the law.

Mr. GLASS. I did on one occasion point the Senator definitely to the law, when he made a similar statement which indicated a lack of information as to what the law was.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator did, I am not aware of it, and I do not remember it.

Mr. GLASS. If the Senator will look at the RECORD, he can very easily see where I very definitely enlightened him on the subject.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to say that I will consult with the Senator from Virginia and get the exact wording of the law and put it in my remarks before I print my speech. I have since ascertained, the law authorizing these loans was full, ample, and complete.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the junior Senator from Utah?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. KING. The statement made by the Senator from Virginia is accurate. It should also be stated as a fact with which Senators should be familiar that the allied nations employed most of the credits extended to them by Congress for the purchase of military supplies and food imperatively required in the prosecution of the war. The money which came from the Treasury of the United States under these credits was paid to Americans who furnished supplies to the allied nations to the value of billions of dollars. Some of the contracts entered into by the allied nations with Americans for these supplies were not fully met at the time of the armistice; that is, payments had not been made in full to contractors, but the obligations of the allied nations existed. The duty rested upon the United States, having extended the credits, to meet the obligations which had been contracted. Accordingly, it may appear that large payments were made after the armistice, but, as indicated, substantially all were on obligations to American citizens or corporations for supplies purchased for war purposes.

It is to be noted, too, that the war had not terminated when the armistice was entered into.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me again?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. The junior Senator from Utah is precisely right. The Treasury simply discharged commitments which it was obliged to discharge. The confusion of the senior Senator from Utah, the chairman of the Finance Committee, arises out of the fact that he thinks the war ended when the last shot was fired and the armistice was signed, when, under the statute, the war ended when the President of the United States so declared by proclamation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to impress these after the war loans upon Senators, and I am going to take a little time to read just a few more of the French loans.

On June 5 they got $10,000,000. On June 16 they got $5,000,000. On June 18 they got $10,000,000.

July was sort of a generous month, and the loans made to France were as follows:

July 1	$10,000,000.00
July 3	20,000,000.00
July 8	5,000,000.00
July 10	15,000,000.00
July 17	5,000,000.00
July 22	5,000,000.00
July 24	5,000,000.00
July 29	5,000,000.00
July 31	5,000,000.00

They got $75,000,000 in July. Later loans were as follows:

Aug. 5	$5,000,000.00
Aug. 7	10,000,000.00
Aug. 19	5,000,000.00
Aug. 25	10,000,000.00
Aug. 28	5,500,000.00
Sept. 2	15,000,000.00
Sept. 4	5,000,000.00
Sept. 11	10,000,000.00
Sept. 18	15,000,000.00
Sept. 25	10,000,000.00
Sept. 26	30,000,000.00
Oct. 1	10,000,000.00
Oct. 7	10,000,000.00
Oct. 17	10,000,000.00
Oct. 21	10,000,000.00

They could not let Armistice Day go by. It seems to have been a holiday, but France borrowed $10,000,000. Other loans were made as follows:

Dec. 8	$10,000,000.00

Jan. 2	10,000,000.00
Feb. 3	10,000,000.00
Feb. 5	10,000,000.00
Mar. 11	10,000,000.00
Apr. 6	10,000,000.00
May 11	10,000,000.00
July 6	10,000,000.00
Aug. 5	10,000,000.00
Aug. 31	10,000,000.00
Sept. 28	10,000,000.00

For nearly two years we loaned those moneys for the rehabilitation of France, for the purpose of aiding her in continuing her government, for the purpose of aiding her in all her governmental activities, and probably some of her allied government activities, including a cash bonus to her soldiers, we have been informed.

Mr. President, we did the same thing for Belgium, we did the same, in a lesser degree, for Great Britain, and we did the same thing for Italy.

At this point I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the postarmistice loans to Belgium, Great Britain, and Italy, by giving dates.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. MCKELLAR. I want to say one other thing about the French debt before I leave that subject. When the war was over we had about $2,000,000,000 worth of supplies in France. If I am wrong about that, the senior Senator from Utah, who was on the commission, can correct me. We had about $2,000,000,000 worth of supplies in France, including railroads, railroad equipment, provisions, clothing, and supplies, and every conceivable kind of property. The French Government and the commission valued that property at $407,000,000, and that was included in the debt which was afterwards canceled by about 50 per cent. In other words, if ever one nation has been generous to another nation in all the history of time, America, which advanced $4,400,000,000 to France and got only about $1,600,000,000 back, has been generous, and I am glad to know that France has never suggested a moratorium or a cancellation of these debts. Indeed, so far as I know, France has rather objected to cancellation, if we are to believe the public prints. All honor to her if this is her position!

Mr. President, under these circumstances, with this generous treatment having been accorded our allies, when we are not attempting to insist on anything but the payment of commercial debts, and only a part of the commercial debts, why all this unseemly haste on the part of our own Government to grant a moratorium?

Here we are—and I want to repeat it, and I may repeat it several times more—$1,700,000,000 in the hole for running expenses; and with our Treasury in that condition our administration is taking the initiative to give up $246,000,000 of interest for this year and recommending a Debt Funding Commission to consider further reductions.

That is not all, however. I want to read, and I want to be very careful what I quote——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair calls attention to the fact that the unfinished business is the election of a president pro tempore of the Senate. That question is debatable, so the Senator from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in a recent message to the Congress—I think it was on last Thursday—the President stated that he wanted a law passed reestablishing the Debt Funding Commission. What could be the President's purpose in having the Debt Funding Commission reestablished if it was not to cancel the debts, in whole or in part? Of course that is the only possible purpose of such a commission. Besides Mr. Mellon the next day said that was its purpose.

It has been stated that the President has said that he is not in favor of canceling the debts. If he is not in favor of canceling the debts why in the world does he recommend that another Debt Funding Commission be established to consider the matter of revision?

Mr. President, it reminds me of the present situation in China; Japan vociferating every day that she is not taking Manchuria at all, and at the same time her armies are taking it. In other words, she is taking it while protesting she is not taking it. It seems to me that the President, while saying that he is not in favor of cancellation, is taking the very necessary steps to cancel. If we may judge by his own word, his own acts, or the words or acts of his associates, he is determined to cancel.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. GORE. The point the Senator is making might well be illustrated by stating that some one said, "Wait until I see you before you do nothing." [Laughter.]

Mr. McKELLAR. That is very true. The next day after that message came from the President we had a statement from Mr. Mellon. The President did not say what his proposed Debt Funding Commission was to do; but the next day after his message came out the Secretary of the Treasury gave out a statement to the papers in which he defended the proposed reestablishment of the Debt Funding Commission on the ground that Great Britain's pound sterling had fallen in value and it was manifestly unfair to make Great Britain pay in a currency that is not as valuable as when the contract was made.

Let us see where that would lead us. It would inevitably lead us to cancellation. All that Great Britain would have to do to get rid of the $4,000,000,000 she owes us, according to Mr. Mellon, would be to run her currency down to virtually nothing and then she could pay us in that depreciated currency. In other words, she could cancel her debt indirectly instead of directly.

I take it that that reasoning will not appeal to any Senator in this body on either side of the aisle. Surely Senators are not going to be beguiled into voting to reestablish the Debt Funding Commission for the purpose of letting the United States be paid in a depreciated currency. In the first place, Great Britain depreciated her currency of her own motion. It was an act of her own government. She had the right to depreciate it or not to depreciate it, but since she did it she ought to take the responsibility for it. She knew perfectly well that she owed these debts and what the monetary yardstick of measurement was, and so it seems to me if she were to set up the argument advanced by the Secretary of the Treasury, she would be claiming a right arising from her own wrong.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The handicap that Great Britain has as a debtor is not any heavier to bear than the handicap which is carried by every debtor in the United States who owes a private debt or who has to pay taxes to meet a public debt. The American debtor, on account of the increased value of gold, finds it 60 per cent harder to pay a debt than when the debt was incurred. I doubt very much if Great Britain carries a greater handicap than that. I would like to have had the Secretary of the Treasury point out the burdens and handicaps of the American debtor as well as the handicaps of Great Britain.

Mr. McKELLAR. I believe the Senator from Minnesota was not in the Chamber at the time I read the advice given by Secretary Mellon on a former occasion, advice which I think is perfectly good and substantiates what the Senator has so well said. I quote from Mr. Mellon on page 422 of the debt-finding report:

> Public officials, whether in the legislative or executive branch of the Government, are essentially trustees. They are trustees for the citizens of their own country.

I digress long enough to say that they are not trustees for the citizens of Great Britain. She is competent to look after her own affairs. If she wants to depreciate her currency, that is her own matter. Why should we volunteer our services in her interest at a time like this when our Treasury is showing a deficit to the extent of $1,700,000,000?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. My attention was diverted and I was called out of the Chamber for a moment and have not heard all of the Senator's address. When my attention was diverted he was reading the payments that were made to the Government of France, giving the dates and amounts. I would like to ask the Senator if he had the same information with regard to the other debtor nations?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I have it before me as to France, Italy, Great Britain, and Belgium. I have already asked unanimous consent that the figures for the other nations might be inserted in the RECORD in my remarks just as if I had read them to the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. The purpose of my interrupting the Senator was to be sure that the information would be included in the Senator's address.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I say that Great Britain's postwar debt was not the largest. France had the largest, and Italy came next. Great Britain was third. Great Britain borrowed after the war between $600,000,000 and $700,000,000, but my reason for making the statement that Great Britain's war debts were canceled was that much of the indebtedness she had previously created was, according to the report of this commission, for purely commercial purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me further, I wonder if he would not include in his remarks the payments and the dates of the payments that were made by the Government of Liberia? The Senator will remember that Liberia declared war against Germany. Has the Senator that information?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not, but if I can secure the information, I will do so. Apparently Cuba, which, I think, paid her war debt, and Liberia owed such small items that they have passed from the record. I shall be glad to furnish the information if I can get it.

Mr. NORRIS. That ought to be in the RECORD, because those loans were made, of course, to nations that were able to and did very materially aid us in the war. Liberia had her standing army and her navy there and accomplished great results. The Senator ought to put that information in the RECORD in connection with his remarks.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator, being a lawyer and a former judge, is familiar with the doctrine of de minimis. Liberia's amount was almost too small to consider—$26,000, I believe—and probably that is why it is not here.

Mr. NORRIS. Liberia's contribution may have been de minimis, but her sacrifices and assistance in the war were certainly not de minimis. Has the Senator any information with respect to the truth of the statements that appeared in the papers to-day that Great Britain and perhaps some of the other countries have the money all ready to pay or did have the money to pay what they owed us to-day, and that they have been advised by our Government not to pay us?

Mr. McKELLAR. Only what the newspapers state. I can not state to the Senator the fact about it; but I do want to say that this is the most remarkable situation I have ever witnessed in all my life. I never heard of anything quite so unaccountable. I remember that Mr. Mussolini last June, when the question of a moratorium first came up, made the statement, or it was published in the papers at least that he had made the statement, that Italy stood ready to pay the amounts she had promised the United States.

The statement was frequently made that not a single foreign nation had refused to pay, that they were all ready to pay, and they would have paid if it had not been for the rather strange interference of the American President. All honor to Italy and to the other nations for taking that fine position. They would be paying us right now, this very day, if it were not for the unaccountable position of President Hoover. Our morning papers stated that several of these nations had deposited the amounts due us with their fiscal agents in this country.

Mr. NORRIS. My information is that not only Great Britain, but some other countries as well, were prepared to make payments to-day, and had the money deposited in banks in this country to do it; but of course they did not pay because our Government did not want the money.

Mr. McKELLAR. I can not imagine why that is. I hope that the committee which has been appointed or authorized to get this information, among other information, under the resolution offered by the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], will bring out all the facts.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator know of any information available anywhere as to what is the purpose of this legislation?

Mr. McKELLAR. No. It was said last June, as the Senator will recall, that the purpose was to aid Germany, and it was conditioned at first on France's declaring a moratorium on the indebtedness Germany owed her. It will be remembered that Germany's indebtedness to France was divided under the Young plan into two classes, one, I think, of about $260,000,000 of nonpostponable debts, and the other of about $140,000,000 of postponable debts under an agreement existing among those nations. Every effort was made by our Government, so the papers stated, to get France to forego the nonpostponable amounts due from Germany of $260,000,000. She would not do so; but the President went right ahead with the moratorium, notwithstanding the fact that France refused to give to Germany the same kind of treatment that we were giving to the rest of the world.

Not only that, but so far as the moratorium aiding Germany is concerned, it did not do it. If it had done that, there might have been some reason for it, but it did not aid Germany to any material degree. Since that time Germany has had to resort to all kinds of measures to keep her government in operation. It did not prevent at all the exporting of her gold, and shortly after the moratorium President von Hindenburg issued an embargo against gold leaving Germany. The Hoover moratorium was a perfect failure so far as aiding Germany was concerned.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield further to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator from Tennessee says that it did not help Germany.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not believe it did so.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If it gave Germany any help, I wish some one who can point that out would show it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope that will be done.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It did not help Germany; in fact, it increased a run on her banks. If there is any valid reason for the legislation that the Senator knows of, I think he would render the Senate a great service if he would show what that reason is.

Mr. McKELLAR. I can only give my view. I know of no reason. It is a remarkable situation. The President has been insisting upon the moratorium as one of his prime policies ever since June when he first announced it. Now, when it comes to the opening of Congress, we have a recommendation from the President that the moratorium be approved, for everybody knows it has to be approved by Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to inquire of the Senator right there on that point——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it necessary that it be approved by Congress? Is it not true that the President has already taken a poll of the House and Senate Members, and that he has the result in his pocket? Why should he not merely declare the result and not bother Congress with the subject?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I regret that the Senator from Nebraska was not in the Chamber when I discussed that question. Of course the President's action in polling Members of the Congress while the Congress was not in session, or while the Congress was in session, for that matter, is wholly unknown to our Constitution and to our laws. His action in postponing these debts was just as illegal as if he had not polled Members of Congress. It is a precedent that ought not to be established. For this reason alone we ought not to ratify the President's action. It was unprecedented. It was dictatorial. It was un-American, and it can not be justly defended. It was in no sense an emergency; at least, it was not an American emergency. If there was any emergency about it, it was an international bankers' emergency, or a foreign emergency.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota will state it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the vote on the moratorium measure has already been taken, the debate of the Senator from Tennessee is out of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee is debating another measure which is pending, which is perfectly in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, all joking aside, it is a very novel situation that the President of the United States should solemnly affirm that he acted upon the advice of the Congress when the Congress had not been in session for three months.

Senators, as I stated this morning—and I repeat the statement, because it seems the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] was not then present—I can not subscribe to that kind of legislation. My oath of office, as I look at it, requires that I vote against a moratorium brought about in this way. I am not criticizing any other Senator. If the Senator from Nebraska signed the poll and agreed to stand by the President, I have no quarrel at all to pick with him; but, as I look at it, I do not think that I, as a Senator of the United States, have the right to deal with measures affecting foreign governments under the poll system.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield further to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator from Tennessee very sincerely for not criticizing me for signing up in advance. I wonder if others of us are bothered as the Senator from Tennessee seems to be because of his oath of office? What has that got to do with it?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am in favor of legislating as the Constitution and laws direct.

Mr. NORRIS. In other words, if that method of legislating is proper, why have an oath of office?

Mr. McKELLAR. And why have sessions of Congress?

Mr. NORRIS. We had just as well go home and let Senators vote by mail.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why should we not all merely send our proxies to the President, or, rather, whenever he wants an act passed, just write him and tell him we approve it, and then let him declare the law passed?

Now, Mr. President, I will go to something else. All over the country to-day the American taxpayer is groaning under a load of taxation never before borne by him or her—municipal taxation, county taxation, State taxation, national taxation. We all realize that in every State in this Union property is being put up for sale in order to pay taxes. Business houses, homes, and farms are being sold. Farms are being put up for sale even by the Federal farm bank, operating under the Farm Board.

I may be wrongly constructed; I may not have the right mental attitude; but I can not, for the life of me, see any justice in declaring a moratorium for the honest debts due to us by foreign nations and declining to declare a moratorium in the case of debts due by the farmers of the country where the American Government itself is the owner of the mortgage. The farmer's plight is so bad that means are now being considered to grant him a moratorium affecting the debts due the Farm Board so that his farm and home may be saved to him; but we seem unwilling to declare a moratorium for the American farmer, although, with a Treasury deficit of $1,700,000,000 staring us in the face, we seem perfectly willing to declare a moratorium on $11,000,000,000 of indebtedness justly due us by foreign nations, and then, perhaps, in whole or in part, to cancel all their indebtedness. I am so constituted mentally that I believe it is our duty as trustees for the American people first to look after their interests.

Whether such an arrangement for the benefit of American farmers can be made through the Farm Board I do not know, but I hope Senators will consider the suggestion. I want to help, if it is humanly possible, the men and women who have mortgages on their farms. I would a thousand times rather help them than to take the tax burdens off the taxpayers of other countries and lay them in addition on the backs of our own taxpayers.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield further to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. We will have to assess our taxpayers $250,000,000 this year in order to take care of this moratorium.

Mr. McKELLAR. The sum is $246,000,000.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And in view of the fact that there are already sufficient votes for that, certainly there will be votes enough to tax the taxpayers so as to provide a moratorium for the farmers.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not sure at all that the Senator is right about that. I have heard in connection with the poll that has already been made that many Senators who will give up $246,000,000 to foreign countries will not vote to help to suspend the operations of the law as to our own farmers.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I might say if the Senator will yield for just a moment further.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I understand one foreign nation had $800,000,000 in gold on deposit in New York a very short time ago and has something like $450,000,000 on deposit there at this time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, Mr. President, I take it that all the debtor nations are able to pay; they never have asserted they were not able to pay. I repeat what I stated previously, that I do not believe it is the purpose of President Hoover unduly to aid the people of foreign nations, but what is uppermost in his mind, as it is uppermost in the minds of many others, is that international bankers own private debts due them from the same foreign countries and they want a preference, and, therefore, this propaganda to cancel the debts supposedly in our own interest. It is absurd. I think the proposal is unpatriotic and unfair; it is unjust, immoral, and indefensible.

Surely, Mr. President, this is no time for our Government to fix a further policy regarding the payment of these debts. As I have shown, there is a 3-year moratorium for the principal of these debts already provided in every contract. Why is not that sufficient? Why should we want to go beyond that without the request from any of our foreign debtors? I do not believe, Mr. President, that we should do so.

There is another reason why we should not enact such legislation at this time, and that reason is that we are now $1,700,000,000 in the red in the ordinary expenditures of the Government. That deficit is growing day by day and hour by hour, and unless it is checked there is no telling where it will lead. It is the duty of the Congress, it seems to me, to cut down expenditures of the Government, to quit spending money that we have not got in the Treasury, and then to raise taxes upon those taxpayers who are able to pay, so, as to use an ordinary expression, to balance our Budget.

There is no reason whatsoever for us to continue the extravagant method we have been pursuing. Mr. President, look what we have been doing for the past two years. The President recommended the creation of the Farm Board in order to bring about relief to the farmers of the country. The Congress, acting upon his recommendation, appropriated the enormous sum of $500,000,000 in the interest of the farmer. All of it has been thrown away; it is a dead loss; instead of doing good, it has probably done harm.

Then another presidential cure-all for business and agricultural difficulties was advanced. It was the high tariff which was enacted by the last Congress. Mr. Hoover approved it, and it became a law. It raised the tariff walls around this country so high that foreign nations could not trade with us, and then nearly every one of them enacted retaliatory measures, so that we could not trade with them. And now we hear the plea, "Cancel the foreign debts and let foreigners have the money so that they can trade with us." If they had every dollar of the money represented by their debts to us they could not trade with us. We have placed our tariff wall so high that they can not trade with us, and so it would be useless to sacrifice the money justly due us on that account.

Then, international conferences were suggested. All these troubles were going to be settled as soon as America participated in an international conference. What has been the result of international conferences? Has any good come of them? Later on the President called a national conference of business men, great captains of industry and of transportation to meet here in Washington to cure the ills which afflicted us; they were going to be cured in 60 days; the depression would be ended in 60 days. That was early in 1930, as I remember. That was the President's statement. The result of that conference was just like the result of all the other nostrums which have been proposed for bringing an end to this great depression.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that the Congress ought to follow the advice of the Secretary of the Treasury when he years ago said that every legislative and executive officer ought to regard himself as a trustee for the American people whom he represents.

I repeat it:

> Public officials, whether in the legislative or executive branch of the Government, are essentially trustees. They are trustees for the citizens of their own country. They are not free to give away the property of the beneficiaries of the trust. An individual can do what he will with his own property. A public official, however, must keep firmly in view that he is dealing not with his own property but with the property intrusted to his care by the citizens of his country.

Moreover, those who urge a complete forgiveness of debts ignore entirely the effect upon the country whose debt is forgiven. All self-respecting people desire to discharge their obligations. This is true of nations as of men. It is true of France.

Mr. President, our duty is plain, as I see it. I think we ought to cut down the expenses of government. Instead of appropriating the vast sums that the President has recommended, and he recommended additional amounts yesterday, amounting in the aggregate almost to five billions of dollars, we ought to cut them down by at least a billion, and in that way restore the balance between the credit side and the debit side of the Government's ledger; and for what can not be restored in that way we ought to put taxes upon those who are able to bear taxes. We ought not to put additional taxes upon those of the American people who are not able to pay them, but we ought to put them upon that class of our people who are able to pay them, and thereby balance the Budget. We should increase taxes in the higher brackets of the income tax, succession or estate taxes; but we should impose no sales taxes and no additional taxes on small incomes.

Senators, we owe a duty to our country. We owe a duty to our country to balance the Budget. You may talk about Great Britain all you desire, but Great Britain is a business nation. In the early part of this year, when she found that her budget was wholly out of gear, her Parliament met and taxed her people, and cut down expenses, and balanced the budget. That is what America ought to do. It is our duty to do it at this time. Let us cut down our expenditures.

Mr. President, just a few more words.

Mr. Mellon said, in his interview the other day, that these foreign debtors ought to be required to pay according to their capacity. My heavens! Are we going to select a time like this as the time for determining capacity to pay? The capacity of France to pay is as great to-day, perhaps, as it ever was. Perhaps there are some other nations that are just as able to pay as they ever were; but are we going to cancel the debts of Great Britain down to the point where she is able to pay in a depreciated currency? I take it that that will not be done.

There is another method which has been suggested, and that is the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]—and I am glad he is here—offers a sugar-coated pill which would have the effect of canceling these debts without the people knowing anything about it. How does he propose to do it?

The newspaper story was, Mr. President, that a day or two ago the Senator went up to the White House; and after talking with the President, without quoting him at all, the Senator came down and introduced a bill to let these nations pay these debts in silver!

Silver to-day is worth 29 cents an ounce.

Mr. SMOOT. If it is worth 29 cents an ounce, that is all they will get credit for.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator says, if we let them pay these debts in silver, that is all they will get credit for. That is over 3 for 1, Mr. President. Suppose America had hauled over here $11,000,000,000 worth of silver or silver that would make over $35,000,000,000 of coin. What would we do with it? What would we do with it, Mr. President? Suppose every nation paid us in silver. That would give us enough silver to coin something like $35,000,000,000 of silver money. What would the American people do with all that silver? It would be the biggest white elephant ever known.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, does the Senator know how many ounces of silver have been produced in the world?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know how many ounces have been produced in the world, but I know that silver is a depreciated currency in this country. It is a depreciated currency in most countries. To-day an ounce of silver is worth less than 30 cents; and if we were to let foreign nations pay these enormous debts to us in silver, we would have the largest frozen asset in all the world, and it would be a silver asset. What could we do with it? It would be better for us to let them pay it in cheese.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator certainly is talking without even looking into the question at all. Does he know that only about eleven billion ounces of silver have been produced in the world?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I did not know that, but I know this: However much may have been produced, silver to-day is at about the lowest price that it has been for a generation, perhaps.

Mr. SMOOT. And the Government would not take it for any more than the price of the silver at the time it was turned over to us. Over half of that eleven billion ounces of silver has been used in manufacturing and in the arts; so that is about 5,500,000,000 ounces. At 29 cents an ounce, as the Senator says, or 30 cents an ounce, that would be $1,650,000,000, as against ten or twelve billions that they owe us.

I have not asked the Senate of the United States to pay $1.29 an ounce. The average price of that silver from the time it was first produced up to the present time was 99.5 cents an ounce. The average price for the last 10 years, excluding this year, was about 55 cents an ounce. It is true that silver now has gone down to 29 cents an ounce. At that price, if it is paid by a foreign country—and those countries have not very much to pay—if they would pay it on these debts at 29 cents an ounce or 30 cents an ounce, I want to say to the Senator that we would be ahead if we accepted it. As between not getting anything and getting silver that can be used in the arts, even at the price at which silver is to-day, I would a thousand times prefer the silver. If those countries do not want the silver, I would prefer their silver to their obligation which is owing the Government to-day, at the market price of the silver.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah reminds me of my early days. The first vote I ever cast was for the "peerless leader," Mr. William Jennings Bryan, the silver-tongued orator from Nebraska, and the orator in behalf of silver, in the year 1896. He convinced me, or others convinced me, that bimetallism was right and that we ought to use silver as a circulating medium; but at that time I remember reading speeches by the able Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] declaring for the gold standard and declaring that gold was the only proper medium of exchange, declaring that silver ought to be outlawed, that it was of no value, that it never did have any value and never would have any value. Historically speaking, I greet with satisfaction the present adherence of the Senator from Utah to the silver cause.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee further yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. When Bryan was asking for the use of silver as a circulating medium, his idea was to make its price $1.29 an ounce. I have not any thought of making it $1.29 an ounce. I have not any thought of the Government of the United States taking any commodity—if silver may be called a commodity—that it could not sell on the market to-day. I am not asking the Government of the United States to lose a cent. I desire to say, however, that if any of those countries that owe money to the United States on war obligations do not desire silver—and I do not think they will be very many in number—I am perfectly willing, as a representative of the State of Utah or as a Senator of the United States, to say, "Whatever the market price is, we will grant you that much credit for any silver you send us upon the obligations that you owe the United States."

That is all I have said in the bill. When it comes to discussing it, I want to go into the details.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think before the Senator gets that bill passed by this body he will have to go into it very much more than he has up to date. All that such action would do would be to create a surplus of silver in America. Here would be the Government owning a tremendous surplus of this depreciated metal that we would have received from our debtors. I have had some experience with surpluses. I know what effect a surplus of 1,300,000 bales of cotton in the hands of the Government has on the price of cotton in my part of the country. It is the greatest depressant of the price in the world. It stands there as a menace to the cotton market; and yet, if the Senator from Utah had his way, he would pile up in the Treasury of the United States silver metal, the price of which would be constantly going down as long as the Government held the surplus, and we all know it.

I am not going into that subject, however, because I doubt if the Senator from Utah will get half a dozen votes for his proposal to permit these debts to be paid in silver at any price. I am not an opponent of silver at all, but that is not the way to handle this question.

Mr. President, before I close I desire to make one statement in behalf of the United States.

It has been said that we have been looking after our own interests to such an extent that we are unable to deal fairly with our debtors. I have before me a statement, carefully prepared, regarding the four countries of Belgium, France, Great Britain, and Italy, showing the principal to be received, the interest we are actually going to receive, and the interest that we would have received if we had charged them the same rate of interest that we are obliged to pay our own people; and then, further, a statement of the interest that would have been received on these debts if the agreements regarding them had been carried out as they were originally made. I ask to have these figures printed as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Amounts to be received from foreign governments by the United States under debt agreements, and the approximate amounts of interest, in addition to the principal, the United States would have received if the debts had been funded on the basis of rates of interest of 4¼ and 5 per cent (computations based upon principal of debts as funded)

Country	Funded indebtedness		Interest which would have been received if debts had been settled on basis of rate of 4¼ per cent	Interest which would have been received if debts had been settled on basis of rate of 5 per cent
	Principal to be received	Interest to be received
Belgium	$417,780,000	$310,050,500.00	$773,272,000	$943,432,000
France	4,025,000,000	2,822,674,104.17	7,449,900,000	9,089,264,000
Great Britain	4,600,000,000	6,505,965,000.00	8,514,172,000	10,387,731,000
Italy	2,042,000,000	365,677,500.00	3,779,552,000	4,611,249,000

Mr. McKELLAR. Now, Mr. President, I want to quote again from the President and Mr. Mellon.

On last Thursday the President reiterated his statement as follows. Now, listen to this:

I do not approve in any remote sense of the cancellation of the debts to us. World confidence would not be enhanced by such action. None of our debtor nations have ever suggested it.

I wonder if my mind is at fault, if I am unable to understand language. Listen to it. I call the attention of Senators on both sides of the aisle to it. This is the language of the President of the United States last week in his message:

I do not approve in any remote sense of the cancellation of the debts to us. World confidence would not be enhanced by such action. None of our debtor nations have ever suggested it.

And yet he is declaring a moratorium—a moratorium that he has asked the Congress to approve, which it has not yet approved—and when the 15th of December was about to roll around an effort was made to get Congress to approve it in some fashion, so that the other nations could be notified that they must not pay what they evidently were ready to pay.

What is there behind this language and those acts? Then the President goes a step further and recommends that another debt-funding commission must be established. He does not explain what he wants it to do; but his Secretary of the Treasury, the next day, does explain what he wants it to do. He says it is to reduce the debts of nations like Great Britain who have debased their currency.

If a commission is appointed, and that commission reduces the debts, and it is all done with the approval and upon the recommendation of the President, I am wondering whether that would not be in a "remote sense" an effort to cancel these debts.

I do not understand the language. I am not going to criticize it because I just do not understand it. If it means what the President seems to think it means, then I can not understand what language does mean. Mr. Mellon went on to say:

The administration is opposed to cancellation. No recommendation made carries any such implication.

If no recommendation makes any such implication, why is it that the President recommends a debt-funding commission to readjust these debts? Why is the argument made for Great Britain that Great Britain has debased her own currency and ought to be allowed to pay less than she is now paying?

Again the Secretary says:

Our debt settlements were effected on the basis of the capacity of the debtors to pay, and we must take into account the abnormal situation now existing in the world.

Then he takes up the British case, showing the fall of the pound sterling, brought about by the act of the British Government, of course, and then he says:

When the British debt settlement was made it was estimated that its present value at a 4¼ per cent interest rate was 80 per cent of the total amount due prior to funding. If the amount to be raised in pounds sterling to meet the obligations to us in dollars is increased by 47 per cent, it becomes apparent that from the standpoint of the British taxpayer he is asked to meet not the obligation as established by our Debt Commission but an amount considerably in excess of such obligation.

He talks about the British taxpayer; but what about the American taxpayer?

Mr. Mellon now pleads for these debtors, and especially for the British. Let us see what he said about these cancellations shortly after he and Mr. Hoover were canceling the war debts.

In a public statement of May 5, 1927, about the British Government's offer to cancel, Mr. Mellon among other things said (p. 631 of Combined Reports of World War Foreign Debt Commission):

By implication this means that should the United States further reduce British obligations to the United States the British Government would cancel a like amount of obligations due to it from its debtors. It is very obvious that the British Government would neither lose nor gain in such a transaction. The United States Government is, however, in a very different position. The British Government is both creditor and debtor. The United States Government is a creditor only; and every dollar of debt canceled by the United States represents an increase by just that amount of the war burden borne by the American taxpayer.

If Mr. Mellon's present contention is accurate that we ought to cancel more of these debts, according to his own statement whenever we cancel or reduce we add just that much greater burden to the American taxpayer. Everyone knows that this is a true statement of the case.

Then Mr. Mellon went on to say, in his recent statement:

It is with such thoughts as these in mind that the President recommended the re-creation of the World War Debt Commission.

I do not know what was in his mind, except from the language, and from the language it looks to me as if there might have been something else.

Mr. President, the last argument made is that we ought to cancel these debts in order to bring about disarmament. If we never get the nations of Europe to disarm until we do it be giving up and canceling these debts, we will never get them to disarm. The truth is that the best way to keep European nations from arming is to let these debts remain just as they are, for the moment they are canceled they will use just that much more money to raise armies and navies in the future as in the past.

I observe in the papers that my good friends, Senators BORAH and WATSON, while opposing cancellation generally, seem to be willing to make further financial concessions to our European debtors if assured that cancellation means reduction of armaments. Of course, I can not assure anyone that further cancellation will mean reduction of armaments, or will not mean reduction of armaments; but I want to give some figures which, in my judgment, will show any fair-minded man that we can not hope to secure reduction of armaments in that way.

In the first place the United States is not in a position to ask for a reduction of armaments. During the last fiscal year Japan spent $236,861,500 on arms; Great Britain spent $465,255,000 on arms; France spent $466,960,000 on arms; the Soviet Union spent $578,942,707 on arms; while America spent $707,425,000 on arms. In other words, here is America spending more on arms than any other nation under the sun, and asking for a reduction!

I hope later to put in the RECORD a table showing the enormous sums that have been spent by these five great nations on arms since 1922, when we first got the habit of disarming—that is, "disarming" without disarming—or at least without any disarmament on the part of anybody except the United States. After the experience we have had with other nations in 1922 and again in 1927, and again in 1930, if we have not learned that it is useless to try to disarm by agreement, we ought to be "bored for the simples."

None of these agreements have accomplished anything for disarmament and nothing will be accomplished in February. The truth is that the one single preventive—and that is not really a preventive but just a deterrent—of the building up of greater armaments abroad is these postwar debts. Whenever we cancel them we give these nations just that much more money with which to build great armies and great navies; and we all know in our own minds that that is just exactly what they are going to do. Why try to delude ourselves? Why not be frank about it?

Every nation on earth except America wants to annex other people's territory and other people's peoples. America does not. For that reason she does not need a large standing army at all; and a large navy would be principally beneficial in aiding to keep the peace of the world. Of course, since America has come to be probably a third-rate naval power, her influence in keeping the peace of the world is very small. Japan's utter disregard of America's treaty obligations as to Manchuria is a perfect example of Japan's contempt for the American Navy, the largest and best part of which unhappily is now lying at the bottom of the sea by reason of disarmament conferences.

So I take it that the Congress will not be deluded into canceling these debts, primarily for international bankers and incidentally for European taxpayers, because of any foolish idea that we may get an arms agreement that will be beneficial to the peace of the world.

But beyond all this these European nations ought to quit building up armies and navies in their own interest. They certainly are not going to do it for us unless they believe it is for their own interest. If they would stop building up great armies and great navies, they could pay us in full in a very short period of time. This they are not going to do, and every informed person knows it.

Mr. President, I have already too long trespassed upon the time of the Senate. I apologize and yield the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, some comment having been made upon Senate bill 1560, introduced by the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], I desire to get a little information from him. This is a brief bill and reads as follows:

That at the request of any foreign government the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to accept, in payment of the whole or any part of the indebtedness now or hereafter owing to the Government of the United States by such foreign Government, silver at the average market price in the United States for the second calendar month preceding date of payment.

Am I correct in my understanding of the statement made by the Senator that the foreign government is to get credit only for the amount it actually pays for the silver?

Mr. SMOOT. The actual price of silver in the markets of the world.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If it goes out into the market and buys a million dollars worth of silver and turns it over to us, it gets credit for the amount it pays for the silver?

Mr. SMOOT. The market value of the silver during that period.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The debt is extinguished only to that extent?

Mr. SMOOT. Only to that extent.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Very well. It will, of course, have to pay gold for that silver which it buys.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know; it may pay goods for it. I do not care how they get the silver.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. How could they get it except by paying in gold or in commodities at their gold price?

Mr. SMOOT. It is not compulsory. If they do not have the silver, they need not pay in silver, but we are perfectly willing to say that we will take silver and credit on the obligation the value of the silver at the market price.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What I would like to know is what incentive is there to a foreign government to pay in silver, which it buys in the world market, when it gets credit only for the current price of silver?

Mr. SMOOT. The incentive is this, that if there is some country which is not on a silver basis, it might throw its silver on the market to-day and sell it for whatever it can and drive the price still lower. Instead of doing this, we say to them, "We will take the silver at the market price in payment on your war obligations."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is practically the same transaction the Farm Board carried on, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Government would be buying silver for the purpose of controlling the price of silver on the market.

Mr. SMOOT. If we were sure the debtor countries were going to pay their debts in full, that would be another question entirely, but it seems to me there is a sentiment, particularly in foreign countries, although it is growing here, too, that they are not going to pay the war debts in full. I think the propaganda from one end of the world to the other for the cancellation of war debts is having its effect in foreign countries and, I might add, in certain sections of this country. I want all to know that if I can prevent that, it will not be done. I am willing to support legislation that will allow foreign countries to pay war obligations with silver at the market value. But if the governments holding every ounce of silver paid all the silver there was in the world, they would pay only a small percentage of the obligations which are owing to the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I did not intend to engage the Senator in any discussion as to the merits of the bill. I was trying to understand the operation of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the effect of the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The effect is, then, that the foreign governments would go out into the market and buy silver at the current market price and pay for it either in gold or in commodities at their gold value and turn that silver over to the United States. I was wondering what possible incentive there could be for that.

As the proposition was originally put up to me some six months ago, it contemplated that the silver should be turned over to the United States at practically the same value as our silver dollar and extinguish the obligations to that extent. I could very readily see how there would be some incentitve to the foreign countries to go into the market and get silver under those circumstances. But if they get credit only for what they pay for it, what incentive is there?

The only thing I see in it is that it is an effort by the Government of the United States to buy silver for the purpose of stabilizing or increasing the price of silver, exactly the same principle under which the Farm Board operates in buying wheat for the purpose of stabilizing the price of wheat or raising its price.

Mr. SMOOT. It could not be the same as the question of wheat. We know how many ounces of silver there are in the world to-day, and we know that some of the countries are trying, every time there is a rise in the price of silver, to dump their silver on the market, just the same as England did when silver went up to 35 cents an ounce a short time ago, and by so doing forced it down to 27 or 28 cents an ounce.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. REED. I had expected the Senator from Montana to go farther and ask about the next step in this proposed transaction. Will the Senator from Utah tell us what he expects the Government of the United States to do with the silver after it receives it?

Mr. SMOOT. They can buy a great deal more with it than they can with the obligation of the countries of the world which desire and expect to have those debts canceled.

Mr. REED. That does not exactly answer my question.

Mr. SMOOT. I know it does not; but silver at the price it brings now can not be produced. It can be manufactured into commodities salable in all parts of the world, no matter how long we live or how long this world exists.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator expect the United States Government to sell that silver in the market, so that it can be manufactured into commodities?

Mr. SMOOT. I am not asking it as a part of our currency or our monetary system. She buys it and she can sell it.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator expect her to sell it promptly?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think we would, promptly. There would be no necessity of selling it promptly.

Mr. REED. Then the Senator would expect us to buy that silver at the world price at the time and to put it in storage and hold it off the market, just as we have been doing with cotton and wheat. Is that the idea?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Is not that exactly the situation, just exactly the same as if the Government of the United States now went out into the market and bought silver at the market price and stored it in the Treasury?

Mr. REED. I can not see the difference between getting it from the foreign government which owes it and going out into the market and buying it from a private citizen.

Mr. SMOOT. If we were sure of getting these debts paid it would be a different proposition; but the Senator knows, as well as everybody else does, that there is a sentiment growing—there is propaganda and has been propaganda for years past that these debts should be canceled. I would rather take the silver at the market price, the world price, any time than take the obligations of the countries which owe us on account of the war debts.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want now for just a few minutes to answer the last statement of the Senator from Utah, and I think, perhaps, this is an appropriate time to do it, because to-day is the day fixed, under the debt-settlement agreements, for the payment of semiannual installments upon the intergovernmental debts which are owed to this country.

It is perfectly true, as the Senator from Utah has just said, that there is propaganda, quite active, in this country, in favor of the cancellation of those debts. It is perfectly true that doubts are expressed about our ever getting any more payments on those intergovernmental obligations, and it is about that that I want for a moment to speak to the Senate.

Mr. President, the propaganda for the cancellation of those debts springs entirely from two sources, one a source to which we need pay no attention—those persons who are interested chiefly in getting further benefit for foreign governments. With that we need not waste our time. Naturally, those who have the interests of European nations at heart would like to see us make further gifts to Europe; but the Senate, the House of Representatives, and the country are not going to be influenced by that kind of propaganda.

Then there is the other kind, the more subtle and the more dangerous kind, which comes from some of our own citizens who are interested chiefly in their own pocketbooks and in the profits they will get from the cancellation of debts due to our Government. I refer principally to those bankers and bond houses who have, since the armistice and since the debt settlements, put out so-called private loans to European nations and the European municipalities, which they would now like to see paid by means of cancellation of the debts owed to the American Government.

Mr. President, let us picture the situation for a moment. When we loaned that money to the foreign governments we did it first under the dire necessity of war time and next under the almost equally dire necessity of post-war prostration, to help in meeting the immediate needs of those countries right after the armistice. The loans were advanced unwillingly by us, and only because of the imperative necessity of winning the war and saving our allies from chaos immediately afterward.

We did not want to advance that money. We knew, if we thought about it at all, that although they made unqualified promises to pay it was going to be difficult for them to pay and difficult for us to collect. We knew that we could not go to war to collect the money. We knew that in every sense those loans were undesirable investments, which we made only because we had to make them.

After those loans were made, after they were resettled in accordance with the capacity-to-pay formula, came a series of private loans. Those private loans were not made under the stress of dire necessity by any means. They were made by American bankers with eyes wide open to the situation of the debtor countries, with full knowledge of the prior existence of this Government's claim, with full knowledge of the difficulty that the debtors would have in meeting both public and private debts. Now to ask that the private claims of some American citizens should be given priority over the intergovernment claims, which are the claims of all American citizens, seems to me to be a piece of outrageous effrontery.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHORTRIDGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I imagine that the Senator is willing to say also that those private loans were, without any warrant of law, approved by the State Department, which now seeks to repudiate its own action.

Mr. REED. No; I do not agree with that. Most of them were made with an express refusal of the State Department to take any action on them. Some of them, the earliest ones, were made after a statement by the State Department that it saw no objection to them, but after they had gone on for a while the State Department went even further and refused even to state that they had no objection. They never approved them so far as I know.

Mr. GLASS. Over a long series of years the State Department, under an arrangement, call it what you will, undertook to approve or disapprove all of those loans to foreign governments. It was so persistent in that utterly lawless transaction that this body, without dissent, passed a resolution calling on the State Department to desist.

Mr. REED. I know of no case in which the State Department ever approved a loan. I do know of cases in which they disapproved.

Mr. GLASS. I know of no case in which they disapproved. I know of a great many cases in which they gave the sanction of the State Department to make these loans. In fact, it was only at the last session of the Congress that the Senate itself unanimously adopted a resolution expressing the conviction that the State Department should no longer engage in that lawless practice.

Mr. REED. If the State Department ever did engage in it, I share with the Senator his disapproval of their having given any such indorsement to these p. ivate loans.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator at the last session of the Senate to me individually said that he thought the resolution which I had presented ought to be passed, and he voted for it.

Mr. REED. Yes; so there would be no danger of indorsement being given. I share with the Senator his belief that the State Department has no business approving these private loans, but I also say again that I have no knowledge and never had any knowledge of any case where they gave an affirmative approval. I will admit that the failure to disapprove created an impression of approval. I am trying to state the thing accurately.

Mr. GLASS. It meant in fact a sanction of the loans.

Mr. REED. It almost did, and I do not approve of it. I am not trying to defend it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I ask the Senator a question to make clear to my own mind at least a phase of this debate that is difficult to understand? Is it the Senator's position that the State Department has no authority to approve loans but has authority to disapprove loans?

Mr. REED. No; I do not think the State Department was ever appointed the censor of private loans abroad or domestic loans.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator several times during his argument declared he knew of instances in which the State Department has disapproved of loans.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But that he knew of no instances in which it had approved loans. What I am wondering is whence the State Department's authority is derived either to approve or disapprove private loans of the character under discussion.

Mr. REED. I do not know that there is anything illegal in expressing the hope that certain loans will not be made to European countries, as the State Department is not constituted to be a censor or appraiser of foreign loans.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That implies that it does not pass upon private foreign loans at all, and that it leaves private citizens to make or not to make loans as they choose

Mr. REED. Exactly; but if the State Department knows some reason why a loan is unwise, it is only doing the reasonable, friendly thing to say so, and in one or two cases that I think I recall they did that.

But that is getting me away from the thread of my argument. What I mean to say is that these private loans were made by some American citizens largely at the instance of American banks and with the full recognition of the prior existence and prior rights of the American Government. I do not believe that the Senate or the House of Representatives is going to yield to persuasion of the propaganda now being put out by distributing houses which floated those loans in the United States. I do not believe we are ever going to subordinate the public loans to those private loans, and we might perhaps clear the air a little bit by saying so.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I do not believe that the propaganda for cancellation, of which the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] tells us, is ever going to make any further headway in the United States. We have canceled all we are going to cancel. It is within the capacity of most of the nations of Europe to pay us the amounts that they owe us, and as long as that fact stares us in the face it is sheer imbecility for us to be any more generous than we have been in the past. We readjusted the debts of France, for example, according to her supposed capacity to pay. So did Great Britain. My personal feeling is that both Great Britain and ourselves got the worst of the bargain, very much the worst, and that after the debts had been settled we were allowed to discover for the first time that the capacity of France to pay was very much greater than anybody outside of France had suspected. Her capacity to-day to pay is greater than our capacity to cancel, and we ought not to dream of any readjustment of that debt.

I shall not point out particular countries, and I am not trying to be offensive to any of them, but, Mr. President, it is silly for a European power owning far-flung colonies, holding lands all around the circuit of the globe, with museums stuffed with art treasures worth millions and millions in money, to say to us, "The exchange is against us; our currency is depreciated; we can not pay America."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I assume from the Senator's statement that he does not favor the revival of the War Debts Commission?

Mr. REED. I do not.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am glad to hear the Senator say that.

Mr. REED. It can have only one result, and that is a further reduction of the amounts due to the United States. Nobody suggests that we shall review those debts with a view to finding an increased capacity to pay on the part of any debtor.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Please let me finish, and then I shall be glad to yield. I am not trying to escape the Senator's question, but just to finish the thought I was trying to express.

Every one of the debt-settlement agreements contains a provision allowing a postponement for a year or two at the request of any debtor nation. Every one of them contains a provision to take care of an emergency in the affairs of the debtor country. We do not need to recreate any debt commission; we do not need to revise those agreements to give them relief from a temporary emergency.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under the terms of the debt settlement each nation involved could at its own request secure a 2-year moratorium instead of 1 year, as proposed by the President?

Mr. REED. Yes. I beg the Senator not to get this confused with the moratorium idea in reparations, because the reparations agreement contains no such postponement agreement.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course; but there is no reparation agreement between Germany and the United States. We are not a party to it at all except indirectly.

Mr. REED. Just the army-of-occupation cost; but that is a small matter. I am talking about the conditions of last July. If there had not been the moratorium, Germany would have gone to smash and everybody knew it; and that is why we all, regardless of party, approved what was done at that time.

Mr. BARKLEY. I agree with the Senator; but was that promised extension, upon which we are required to vote, made at the request of any nation or was it made voluntarily on the part of the Government of the United States?

Mr. REED. The suggestion seems to have been spontaneous with the Government of the United States, and if the French had been a little bit quicker in falling into line with it we would have felt the benefits of it much more than we have; but as it was, it saved Germany from bankruptcy last July.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have heard that statement from many sources, that we saved Germany from bankruptcy. I would like to have some one tell us just how we saved Germany.

Mr. REED. I will tell the Senator. Last July when that proposal was made Germany was losing in the actual export of capital, as I recall the figures, about 80,000,000 gold marks per business day. Every day that the situation remained as it was there was an actual export of capital from Germany, a flowing out of the country, of about 80,000,000 gold marks. We could stand that and France could stand it, but Germany could not begin to stand it with the minute gold resources she had. Japan did not have to stand anything like as bad a drain as that, and yet she has gone off the gold standard for exactly the same reason.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Was not the gold export from Germany to a large extent by her own nationals?

Mr. REED. To a large extent. It was by French bankers withdrawing their credit; it was by German nationals, who were frightened, trying to get their capital or credit into other countries. It was by everybody who had a stake in Germany trying to convert it into the credit or the currency of some other nation.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator knows, of course, that the proposal originated in the United States for the moratorium and it originated in the minds of the same people that he tells us also want a cancellation of indebtedness.

Mr. REED. On the contrary I happen to know that it did not, because the President discussed the question of a moratorium with me long before those New York bankers thought that they invented the idea. I know that of my own knowledge.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is it not true that after the moratorium the German President, with the approval of his Government, had to issue an order prohibiting gold being shipped out of the country? They did that after the moratorium.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Was it not the order of President Hindenburg prohibiting the shipment of gold out of the country rather than the moratorium that prevented the shipping of gold out of Germany?

Mr. REED. No. The moratorium had to be reenforced by a lot of measures in Germany compared to which no wartime steps ever taken in this country are even severe. They have done things in Germany in the last week that would be utterly unthinkable in the United States, in a compulsory reduction of established contracts, for the payment of interest, in compulsory reduction of credits upon prices, in drastic efforts to try to keep themselves solvent. They will have to follow that up for a long time to come. But it was the moratorium that saved them from a complete bankruptcy in July.

But let me come back to the debt settlement, because I am almost through.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, before the Senator does that, may I ask just one further question?

Mr. REED. Very well; I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator referred to the flow of gold out of Germany. Does the Senator mean that the moratorium had a tendency to stop that flow?

Mr. REED. It was the first step necessary to stop it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. In what manner did it in any way influence the flight of capital from Germany?

Mr. REED. Because it so restored confidence in the continued solvency and endurance of Germany that the desire to export capital disappeared.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I beg the Senator's pardon, but he is very much misinformed.

Mr. REED. Perhaps I am, as I do not have any private information about it. I was only watching the results, and those were the results.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. There was no relaxation of the flight of capital until the German Government absolutely prohibited it of its own accord.

Mr. REED. On the other hand, the very announcement of the proposal of the moratorium was followed immediately by a very great diminution of the exchange transactions that showed the flight of capital. It is all susceptible of proof by the daily newspapers. We need not argue about our recollection.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I simply wanted to call attention to the fact that all lines of German credit were very much decreased by the announcement of the moratorium.

Mr. REED. My recollection is to the contrary, and I think the newspapers bear me out.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield further to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. One of the reasons was that the German people expected, after they got the moratorium, that there would be a cancellation of debts to follow it.

Mr. REED. I do not agree with that.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator does not agree with it?

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. WHEELER. All the Senator has to do is to go to Germany and talk with Germans and he will find that is one of the reasons why they were willing to keep their money in Germany. It was because they thought there would be a cancellation of debt. It was on the theory that there was going to be a cancellation of debts and not merely the moratorium.

Mr. REED. Of course, the Germans want the reparations payments canceled; the French want their debt canceled; everybody wants his debt canceled; we as individuals would like to see our debts canceled; and foreign governments are going to keep on asking for cancellation so long as our unwise statements lead them to think there is any possibility of getting it. That is what I rose to protest against. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] implied that he had small hope of our ever collecting on our foreign debts. That is what I want to protest against. There is no reason why we should not have hope of collecting those debts, and we will collect them, and will do so much sooner when we quit giving encouragement to the foreign debtor governments by implying that we do not expect them to pay.

The fact is—and I think I am speaking for both sides of the aisle—that we do expect them to pay; that we regard their promise as we would regard our own promise, as one that was made in all sincerity and with the expectation of fulfillment. I firmly believe, Mr. President, that they can pay; I firmly believe that they will pay, if we in Congress will, once for all, put our foot down on the propaganda for cancellation or for postponement. There is no reason why we should not be paid. In the debt settlements we made we have been generous beyond anything that history shows. We have forgiven our former allies practically every cent that was advanced to them before the armistice.

So far as Great Britain goes, I have oftentimes been told that we were bearing hardly upon Great Britain; I have been told that by British people, who said there never could be any real friendship between us and them so long as we were extorting payment on the British debt. Mr. President, when remarks like that are made we ought instantly to reply, "You are not paying us one cent out of taxation; the British treasury is not suffering one single farthing by its payments to us, because for every cent that is being paid to us by the British a corresponding cent is coming in from the Continent on similar intergovernmental debts." Not one penny of British taxation comes to the United States under these debt-settlement agreements. Let us keep that in mind, and use it for a retort to some of those who imply we are playing "Uncle Shylock" to our loyal friendly allies.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania speak for the administration—that is, for the White House—in making that statement?

Mr. REED. I never speak for the White House; I speak for myself only. Sometimes I seem to agree with the White House, and sometimes not; but I have many times stated on the floor of the Senate that nobody is responsible for what I am saying except myself.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator, in view of the sentiments which he has expressed, and with which I entirely agree, is there any necessity for the re-creation of the War Debts Commission?

Mr. REED. No; I see no necessity for it, and I think its re-creation might be followed by very unfortunate results. For that reason I myself do not approve the suggestion.

Mr. President, I have practically finished. I rose merely to protest, in the consideration of the moratorium and in the consideration of other intergovernmental financial questions, against statements from any of us to the effect that at the bottom of our hearts we do not expect these debts to be paid, for we do expect them to be paid, Mr. President, and we are false to ourselves when we imply that the expectation is the contrary of that.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I understood the Senator when he rose to state that he would say something about the postponement of the payments which are due to-day. Perhaps, however, I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. REED. I referred to postponement under the moratorium.

Mr. DILL. But no moratorium has as yet been granted under the law.

Mr. REED. No; that is quite correct. Under the law there is, technically, no moratorium, and there is a default; but a vast majority of the membership of both Houses of Congress have authorized the assurance that the moratorium will be approved by Congress; and we know that, in all good conscience, there is no default; at least, that is my own private view.

Mr. DILL. Does not the Senator realize that many of those who were willing to vote for a moratorium of one year when it was first proposed have since come to the conclusion that the moratorium of one year is to be the beginning of a system of moratoriums, leading to cancellation, at least from the viewpoint of the European debtor?

Mr. REED. I do not know the viewpoint of the European debtor, but it certainly is not the opening wedge, so far as I am concerned, and I do not believe it is the opening wedge so far as most Members of Congress are concerned; and, however we may have changed our minds, I regard myself as bound by the word that I gave when the moratorium was suggested.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I desire to follow the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] for a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. What I wish to state will require only a moment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am informed by the State Department that the department has never approved a private foreign loan at any time in the history of the Government.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, that certainly can not relate to bank loans to private individuals, because the State Department has persistently, over a period of two years, asserted the right to do that very thing, although unable all the while to point to statutory authorization for it. Why did the Senate of the United States, at the last session, adopt a resolution condemning the activities of the State Department in that respect and why did the distinguished Secretary of State on the day following issue a semiofficial statement to the effect that he was going to disregard the action of the Senate in adopting that resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, Mr. Feis, who is the head economist of the State Department, just advises me that that department has never approved a private foreign loan—I say "a private foreign loan."

Mr. GLASS. That is in utter contradiction of the contention of the State Department for the last two years.

Mr. SMOOT. I merely make this statement because I have been so informed.

Mr. GLASS. Well, I, too, am merely making that statement. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that I have not gone up to the State Department and talked to any official about it. This information just came up and was sent to me.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator from Utah inform us of the source of his information?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I said it came from Mr. Feis, the head economist of the State Department.

Mr. GLASS. It is in contradiction to the record.

Mr. SMOOT. I am just stating this because I asked a question bearing on the subject.

Mr. President, I suppose there is nobody in the United States who is more opposed to a cancellation of foreign war debts than am I. I have so stated on a number of different occasions; I have never spoken about the debt settlement but that I have stated that I was absolutely opposed to a cancellation of foreign debts. I never expect to vote for such a cancellation at any time, because I think it would be an injustice to the people of our own country.

I wanted to say that because it may be that some Senators feel otherwise because of what the press has printed of late.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. DILL. Does not the Senator think it is better to let our foreign debtors default or repudiate than for us to continue to forgive and cancel their debts?

Mr. SMOOT. I was one who approved of the moratorium under conditions existing at the particular time. I could only repeat, if I were going to tell the story of my personal experience, what the Senator from Pennsylvania has already said in relation to it. I think that if the moratorium had not been announced to the world at the time it was there would have been an absolute disruption of the German Government, and no one can tell if such a disruption had occurred how far it would have affected the financial affairs of the world; and I am quite sure the baneful effects would have reached the Government of the United States.

Mr. DILL. But my question related to the future rather than the past. The Senator a few moments ago, as I understood him, said he never expected the foreign governments to pay those debts. He now says he is in favor of their paying the debts.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah said what?

Mr. DILL. The Senator from Utah said that he is in favor of making them pay their debts.

Mr. SMOOT. I always have been in favor of their doing so and never said anything to the contrary.

Mr. DILL. But only a few moments before that the Senator said he never expected them to pay the remainder of the debts. Does not the Senator think it is better for this country to insist upon the payment of the debts and let the foreign nations repudiate them, or to default if they see fit, rather than for us to cancel them?

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, it will be a defalcation rather than a forgiveness of the debts; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I feel at this juncture it ought to be said that nothwithstanding the propaganda in favor of cancellation there is no fact or circumstance within my knowledge that justifies the assumption by anyone that any government in debt to the United States will repudiate its obligations. I have the conviction that every one of them will discharge its obligations.

Mr. SMOOT. I presume the Senator is perfectly aware of the propaganda that has gone from one end of this country to the other, proceeding from nearly every country that owes us, pointing out the absolute necessity of the cancellation of those debts. I think every Senator must have received literature and communications of that kind, including private letters even from citizens of foreign countries residing in the United States. It is going on yet, and it has been going on ever since the settlements were made.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Evidently—if the Senator from Utah will pardon me——

Mr. SMOOT. I have no idea, I will say to the Senator, that the Government of the United States is going to cancel those debts. So far as I am personally concerned, I would rather have the foreign governments repudiate them or fail to pay them, rather than for the Government of the United States to take any action cancelling the debts.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think it is unfortunate for the Senate to proceed in this discussion on the theory that a debtor nation would repudiate its obligations. That is the point I rose to make. What government now owing the United States has taken any action to warrant the assumption on the part of any Senator that it intends to repudiate its debts?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I think, in fairness to the foreign governments that owe us, it ought to be said that not one of them has even asked for a reduction.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the press reports are to be relied on as accurate, notwithstanding the fact that the President, in the extremity which has been described, assumed to suggest a moratorium as to payments now maturing, several of those governments have deposited moneys within the United States sufficient in amount to meet every dollar of the obligations due to-day. The point I am making is that it is not a courteous thing, in view of the record, for Senators to proceed upon the theory that these debtors will repudiate their indebtedness.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I think I am the Senator who brought that suggestion into this discussion, and I want to say to the Senator from Arkansas that I had no thought of suggesting that they would repudiate or default.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am sure that is true.

Mr. DILL. But the thought I wanted to give expression to, and which I had hoped the Senator from Utah would give expression to, was that if it came to the point where this country must cancel or they must repudiate, we want them to take the responsibility of repudiating rather than for us to take the responsibility of canceling.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understood perfectly well that the Senator stated a hypothetical question, and I think, in view of the fact that several of the foreign governments were ready to pay, notwithstanding the moratorium had been suggested upon the theory that they could not pay, that we ought, in all courtesy, to recognize their attitude, and in the discussion of questions pertaining to foreign debts ought not to assume if we do not cancel—which we will not—that they will repudiate. They will pay.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I want to compliment the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] upon his usual clarity of statement and the irrefutable logic by which he demonstrates that this country should not discharge its foreign debts. He is entirely right; and when the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] joins him with the emphasis that is peculiarly that Senator's, and says that he does not favor cancellation—and I presume, of course, he means, too, reduction—of these foreign debts, I compliment him as well. It is an excellent thing, Mr. President, to find these Senators and all the others upon this floor standing firmly to-day for the rights first of America, and endeavoring to present the right of this country to the collection of that which is justly this country's due.

I might say, in response to what has been said about what governments may and may not endeavor to repudiate our debts, that I have before me the remarks of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald during his campaign, in which he said again and again to his constituents in substance that the moratorium, thank God, ended all foreign debts, and never again will our people—those of the English nation or those of any other country in Europe—be troubled with the payment of the debts that have been asserted to be due from those countries unto the United States of America.

So, I might say, are the views that have been uttered by other responsible statesmen across the water. But that, sir, is apart from the immediate discussion in which we indulge.

The Senator from Pennsylvania has performed, I think, a very excellent service in stating the position that is maintained by those he represents upon this question to-day, so that there can not be hereafter any misunderstanding respecting the attitude of the United States Senate. I am delighted, sir—more than delighted; I rejoice in my very soul—that finally there has been spoken the language that is unmistakable upon this floor concerning cancellation, and, too, as I take it, reduction of the debts that are due to the United States from foreign nations; for, of course, Mr. President, if we agree to a moratorium to-day upon the specious ground that some nation across the water is going to be affected in its economic life by paying some other nation than ours, then of course the argument is equally cogent six months or a year hence, when another moratorium may be asked and a reduction again demanded because of the economic life of the nation that asks it, or the economic life of some nation adjoining it.

So the logic of the situation as presented to-day, and by the arguments of those who have preceded me, is that we should stand here upon our rights—not harshly, of course, for in every debt settlement are written the right and the privilege of the debtor nation to request an extension of time, and that, if ever requested, should be taken up in generous spirit by our Government. We should stand upon the solemn agreements to pay only a part of our due made by foreign nations.

But, sir, when we talk of a moratorium that postpones an indebtedness to-day, we must look forward to a moratorium that will postpone an indebtedness next year and we must look forward to a moratorium that will continue and postpone indebtedness two years from now; and so when you have reached the logical conclusion of your moratorium, you come to the implication of a relinquishment of our rights and you come into the position where, of course, if the logic to-day demands a moratorium and the logic to-morrow may demand another moratorium, you may talk until you are black in the face about refusing to grant cancellation, but you are permitting the opening wedge to cancellation.

Our friend from Pennsylvania says to us that he will not subordinate public to private loans. He is right. He is right. Upon what theory do you subordinate the right of the United States Government, representing all the people of this land, to the payment of what is our whole people's due to the payment of international bankers upon the claims that are theirs?

We forgave by a moratorium $246,000,000 for a year. Did you read the testimony of Doctor Melchior in Switzerland the other day? By a singular coincidence Germany in the last six months, upon short-term credits, paid $230,000,000—short-term credits held by whom? Not by ordinary individuals and small people in this land, of course; short-term credits held, of course, by bankers; and when you grant a moratorium you are doing exactly the thing against which the Senator from Pennsylvania inveighs. You are putting priority upon the claim of the international bankers and you are subordinating the claim of the people of the United States of America.

I am against this moratorium, sir, if mine is the only vote in this Chamber to be against it. I am against it because it puts upon the backs of already overburdened American taxpayers the amount of the debts due to them from foreign governments and foreign peoples. Upon what theory, sir, do you to-day in this country, when you know the distress that exists here, when you know that we have a deficit greater than that of any other country on earth, why to-day do you levy taxes greater than ever before were levied in our country in peace times, levy taxes to pay a deficit in part occasioned by the fact that you have permitted $246,000,000 to be paid to international bankers upon their obligations, instead of on the obligations due unto the people of the United States?

The time finally has come in this country when, however weak the voice or however humble the individual or however small may be the compass of those he may reach in words, some one must cry aloud for America and Americans and endeavor to protect these people of ours, already staggering under taxation and crushed by disaster, from those who would fasten upon them an additional sum that is their due and that they ought to have.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], in answer to a question as to what is the purpose of this moratorium, have stated that the moratorium was necessary in order to save Germany from collapse; that it was made absolutely necessary by the logic of the circumstances existing at the time the moratorium was proclaimed.

I hope both the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Pennsylvania will inform the Senate, if they have any information on the subject, as to just what were the conditions existing at the time. They have made the statement that the moratorium saved Germany from collapse. I trust that before we come to a vote on the moratorium question, they will state just how it saved Germany from collapse. My information is that instead of saving Germany from collapse, it drove Germany very much nearer to collapse than she would have been if there had been no moratorium.

The banks of Germany did not begin to close until a long time after the moratorium was proclaimed. The flight of capital from Germany had been going on for very nearly six months. One bank alone had paid out over 700,000,000 marks in gold; but when the fact of the flight of capital from Germany was advertised throughout the world, that flight increased until most of the large banks, including the central bank of Germany, were forced to close a long time after Germany, France, and England were informed that we were willing to forego the payments on the debts this year.

Certainly there is nothing in the record to show that this moratorium was of the slightest aid to Germany. It did not affect her reparation payments. Germany could not have paid reparations anyway; and the flight of capital from Germany ceased only when as much foreign capital as could be taken had been taken out of Germany and when the German Government took drastic steps to prohibit the exportation of capital not only by citizens living in Germany at the time but by citizens of foreign countries who were drawing money from Germany. The flight of capital from Germany was stopped by the act of the German Government, and the act necessary to stop the flight of capital from Germany was taken by the Government a long time after the proclamation of the moratorium.

As a matter of fact, 90 per cent of the enthusiasm of Europe over the moratorium was based upon the idea that this was the opening wedge for the cancellation of the debts to the United States. That is what made the stock markets go up in London and in New York for a period of time. When they began to hear statements that certain people did not connect debt cancellation with the moratorium, the enthusiasm and the joy disappeared.

If there are any facts in the record to show that there was anything else in this picture, I hope those who are informed of those facts will present them to the Senate.

If they are in the archives of the Department of State, we ought to have them. If they are in the archives of the White House, we ought to have them. If those facts are in the archives of any committee of the Senate, we ought to have them.

I have been searching for the reasons for this moratorium outside of the cancellation of debts, and I have failed to find any.

"MONEY—CREDIT"

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial by Judge John W. Dodge, of Jacksonville, Fla., entitled "Money—Credit," appearing in the Deland (Fla.) News.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Deland (Fla.) News]

MONEY—CREDIT—A BLESSING—A CURSE

By Judge John W. Dodge

We hear of, speak of, and think of money daily, even hourly, as we never have before. It is the subject and theme of high and low, rich and poor.

Money, however, is largely a mere medium of exchange. It is the thing which, being generally used and accepted as having, or being backed up by, value of some kind, is used as a denominator of value. It enables people to transact business, or make contracts, and to carry out the same—to exchange property, services, or other things of value.

Credit is far more powerful than money. Ninety per cent of all business is a mere exchange of credit. Credit is the world's greatest method and means of sales and exchange.

We are suffering to-day from a lack of credit—frozen credits—a refusal of those who control credit to use, or allow it to be used, by men and women who can furnish property or services to others, but have no medium (credit) with which to bring about a sale or exchange of property or services.

Manufacturers are equipped to make merchandise of all kinds—they want to sell it. The masses want to purchase merchandise and other things. They have services, labor, even property, which they desire to exchange, to sell, to deliver to other people. But there are no means, methods, money, credit, or other facilities open to the masses as the mediums of exchange. Stagnation has resulted.

The fundamental cause of our depression is, therefore, the lack of agencies and instrumentalities which can bring about an exchange between people.

The banks are the ones, the only ones, who can use our Federal reserve system. They refuse to use it—they refuse to furnish a medium of exchange of either money or credit—they refuse to function. The Federal reserve is, therefore, made practically useless in a large degree.

The banks and others holding money and controlling credits have created a cash-basis system upon which others must do business—must make exchanges. The result is that we are far below normal; we are tied up; exchanges can not be made where it takes some time to complete the exchange, to enable goods to be sold, to allow people to work, to create a purchasing power.

We are getting on a barter basis—a cash-delivery system. There are no credits extended. Values have dropped because contracts and sales can not be made, while money and credit are frozen without by those who control them.

Money and credit rightly used is a blessing—tied up, controlled, manipulated for selfish uses and purposes, they are a curse.

We need new leaders—new controllers of credit—a rightful use of our mediums of exchange. Taxation of swollen credits distributes controlled credits and money.

RELIEF MEASURES

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter of Dr. Jacob Billikopf, executive director of the Federation of Jewish Charities of Philadelphia and impartial chairman of the Men's Clothing Industry, of New York City. This letter was printed in part in yesterday morning's New York Times. For lack of space it was not completely published. I ask publication of the entire letter in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

DECEMBER 14, 1931.

To the EDITOR NEW YORK TIMES:

In a recent editorial, the Times rightly congratulated the organizers of the charitable drives throughout the country on their showings to date. As a director of a federation of charities, which benefits by such a campaign; as a member of the Unemployment Relief Committee, which also benefits by it; and as one of the organizers of a united campaign for $9,000,000—that of Philadelphia—I can not be set down as an outside disparager of their efforts. I have been in it up to my elbows.

Yet any implication that the success of the community-chest campaigns in the 144 cities that have thus far reported indicates that the unemployment-relief situation is in hand is not supported by facts. A community chest is a concert of all sorts of welfare agencies: Hospitals, homes for the aged, child-welfare and family-welfare societies, orphanages, Y. M. and Y. W. C. A.'s, and Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts. What these 144 campaigns indicate is that 144 exceptionally well-organized cities are supporting this whole social-welfare structure, with emergent relief work as a new and important unit. For the thousands of other cities, towns, and villages of the country the success of the chest campaigns means nothing at all.

For 130 of these 144 cities we have data comparable with last year's, which shows an increase of 14.3 per cent in funds raised. This is presumably far more than for relief purposes. Yet relief demands in every American city show an increase quite out of proportion to this gain. Philadelphia's relief expenditures during September of this year were 404 per cent above September, 1930; Chicago's, 267 per cent; New York's, 125 per cent; Cleveland's, 134 per cent; St. Louis's, 214 per cent. Against the rise in need shown by these September figures the increase of 14.3 per cent in private funds for all welfare purposes in 130 cities is not impressive.

In normal times about 30 per cent of the relief needs of the average city are met by private funds, the rest coming from city and county funds. It is obvious that the great bulk of the increased burden of relief must be met by greatly increased public appropriations. But it is the rare city or town that has yet taken action that even remotely suggests adequacy or even awareness.

The interpretation given by the press generally, in headlines and in editorial comment, to the success of the community-chest campaigns this year under the ægis of the President's committee, is dangerous in its tendency to lull the public into a false security on the whole relief situation throughout the country this winter. In New York there has been a straight drive for money for work relief. But that is not the situation generally. In order to stimulate contributions in a time of stringency, relief and unemployment have been ballyhooed from Washington out of all proportion to their place in the chest budgets. The maintenance of the general structure and service of social work is as important as relief; it is more important than ever in hard times. It is as important as keeping up a fire department at its most effective working pitch at a time of drought; of keeping up hospitals and regular health services in time of epidemic. None the less it is unfortunate that because of these circumstances the newspapers and the public are likely to assume that, with the charitable drives out of the way, relief is all attended to and our duty is done.

In the first place we shall not have done our duty in the situation so long as there is such a wide spread between the relief granted by our emergency set-ups and the relief standards set by our going charitable agencies in normal times, based on their studies of what will keep a household intact. Here in Philadelphia, for example—and you must remember that I am identified with both organizations—the minimum relief accorded a family of five by the family society of the Federation of Jewish Charities is $21.97, divided as follows: Food, $9.25; lunches, 60 cents; rent, $5.77 ($25 per month, 5-room house); light and cooking, 69 cents; clothing, $2.92; household supplies, 35 cents; car fare, 90 cents; incidentals, 64 cents; coal, 85 cents (on a weekly basis throughout the year).

This is not guesswork; it is based on the most rigorous studies of what is needed to keep body and soul together; to keep health from being impaired; to conserve what we do not want to see broken down in family life. The relief available and distributed by our emergency unemployment-relief committee, which now has under its care 35,000 families, is so far under this standard of adequacy as to be self-evident. It has amounted to $5 per week for a family of five, for food only. No provision is made for any of the other items in the above schedule, with the exception of milk, which is granted only when necessary.

We shall not have done our duty by the situation until the smaller cities and towns and the outlying districts, such as the coal fields, are covered.

We shall not have done our duty until municipal and county appropriations are actually available to supplement the charitable funds in large cities and small, which by no stretch of the imagination can meet the situation. And there has been no effective leadership from Washington to elicit forethought, planning, and emergent action on the part of local public officials throughout the country.

We shall not have done our duty by the situation until State resources are put behind city funds where these fall short. New York, thanks to Governor Roosevelt, has made the outstanding move in this direction. Pennsylvania, under Pinchot, is in the throes of doing it. But the Pennsylvania Governor has been blocked by constitutional restrictions and by other limitations. The Wisconsin Legislature, now in special session, has before it a rounded program blocked out by an interim committee. But for the most part the States are as yet inactive, and the winter is almost upon us. And there has been no calling of the governors into conference at Washington to set the wheels going, or a kindred challenge to State action.

We shall not have done our duty if hunger walks the streets this winter and if we fail to tap national resources, should State resources and action fall short. So far as I know, there has been no survey by the leaders at Washington of the extent of city and State revenues which can or might be available, without which knowledge Congress can not act intelligently or intelligently refrain from action.

We shall not have done our duty if in the midst of this depression and its mass unemployment we do not take steps to lay the foundations of a system through which industry shall itself, out of the surplus of normal times, lay by some reserves to give security to the families of the workers it laid off. Unemployment is an industrial risk, and there is neither logic nor reason in letting the whole burden come down, as so much of it does now, on charitable givers, on real-estate-tax payers, and on working-class homes.

If we turn to the Survey, the journal of the social workers of the country, we find the situation summed up by its editor, Mr. Paul U. Kellogg, as follows:

"That we should be in the mess we are in after a decade of soaring prosperity is all the more a call for new leadership in our industrial civilization. Unemployment relief thrusts a staggering burden upon our social agencies, public and private. It shakes and may shatter our whole scheme of social work—health, recreation, education, case standards—for helping people in the ordinary coils of misfortune. Yet it is driven home to us that charitable giving is not sufficient. The relief budgets embedded in the sums raised by the community drives under the lead of the President's committee won't of themselves last the winter out. They can't make up for the flattening out of pay envelopes everywhere. Social workers who are stewards of these funds know this. We turn to municipal help, but that throws onto real estate the brunt of an industrial risk at a time when landlords are shy on rents, when business is stalled, and when home owners run the risk of losing their equities. This left-handed blow at middle-class incomes gives another twist to the down-spiral of purchasing power. Moreover, the resources of hundreds of American municipalities will be cramped for a long time to come because of their relief bills last winter and this.

"Slowly we have begun to realize that local taxation will not afford enough money. In New York, Governor Roosevelt has turned to the State income tax to carry a part of the load. His was a courageous, resourceful move, but again it cuts in on current private incomes at a time when they are reduced and are needed for revival. In Rhode Island the State contemplates underwriting the emergent relief bonds of municipalities, but that is mortgaging the time ahead when Rhode Island will be struggling to its feet. The same is true of Governor Pinchot's prosperity loan in Pennsylvania; equally courageous and resourceful, but equally an augmented tax on times ahead for an evil that should have been fended against and met in part in times past. There will be a drive for Federal relief if hunger stalks this winter. A lot can be said for tapping the one great stream of national income to buoy up what is a national emergency as truly as any war. Not since the Civil War have we known a conflict which devastated American homes like this depression.

"But my point is that these are all hectic efforts to close the door after the horse is stolen, to try, out of the shrunken income of hard times, to temper their impact.

"Why shouldn't American industry, as a matter of self-respect and self-dependence, of long-range common sense, set its house in order so that hereafter, in good times, it will lay by some measure of resources that can be unlimbered at the first turn of that spiral? Is it so hopeless to find a modern counterpart for what Joseph did with his granaries during the seven fat years in Egypt? After all, we are having a pretty thorough awakening from our dreams, too."

JACOB BILLIKOPF,
Executive Director Federation of Jewish Charities, Philadelphia; Impartial Chairman Men's Clothing Industry, City of New York.

MR. BOWERS ON THE POLITICAL SITUATION

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the Washington Times of December 9, by Mr. Claude G. Bowers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Times, Washington, D. C., December 9, 1931]

DONNYBROOK-KILKENNY IN WASHINGTON

By Claude G. Bowers

Under the great dome of the Capitol in Washington the chosen representatives of the people have assembled.

Mark Sullivan is an important correspondent, because his intimacy with the President reflects the presidential hopes and plans. Clearly we are to hear much about the desirability of a "coalition" government, of that "cooperation" which experience has shown means, in the mind of Mr. Hoover, the subserviency of the Democrats to the presidential policies that so signally have failed to appeal to the judgment of the people. The issues, of course, will be economic, but we would no more expect the two parties to entertain the same views on all the economic problems than we would have expected Woodrow Wilson and Nelson Aldrich to have agreed upon them.

THINKS ADMINISTRATION HOPES FOR DISRUPTION

The evidently desperate hope of the administration is that the Democrats will fly at one another's throats on nonessentials and kill their own fair prospects. Mr. Sullivan is rather distressed about it. He thinks that "maybe" they will be harmonious. He evokes the memories of the convention of 1924. He is sure they are going to split because of sectional differences—they, of the only party that is not purely sectional.

They have just agreed in perfect harmony to a Speaker from the South and a leader from the North, but that does not calm the fears of the administration circle. And Mr. Sullivan is alarmed lest the Democrats disagree on prohibition, forgetting conveniently that the Republicans are not in agreement on it. And he informs us of something we did not know—that the public "tends to think the Democrats are rather given to chaos, to Donnybrook fairs and Kilkenny noises." This based, no doubt, upon the strong, sane, constructive, and harmonious manner in which the Democrats, under the leadership of Clark and Underwood, managed the House under similar conditions.

REPUBLICANS FAIL TO SEE ALIKE

All these lugubrious lamentations of the administration camp at first were puzzling, until in the same issue of the New York Herald Tribune we turned to the forecasts of the session from Senator FESS, one of the field marshals of the President, and from Senator NYE, representing the Republican insurgents. And then we saw that it was a "stop thief" hue and cry in the hope of diverting attention from the unfortunate dissensions in the administration camp.

Senator FESS, running true to administration form, devotes much of his article to the dreadful conditions across the sea. Senator NYE confines himself, as an American Senator, to the dreadful conditions here at home.

The two men are unable to see alike on what the administration has done to prevent human misery and starvation. Thus Senator FESS tells us:

"The spiritual and material strength of our people have been marshaled and funds are being gathered locally throughout the country to prevent starvation this winter."

This, of course, is nothing that the administration, the people's national Government is doing. Senator NYE does not share in his colleague's bland satisfaction. On the contrary, he says:

"The Federal Government has merely touched the hem or fringe of the unemployment situation with a totally inadequate relief program, a mere pittance. What is needed and what will be proposed by Progressives is a building and constructive program of sufficient magnitude. The duty of a national government is to meet a national crisis in a national way with the power of the nation, instead of running from its duty."

And there is more than a touch of Donnybrook fair in that!

KILKENNY BATTLE ON TARIFF ISSUES

Then Senator FESS, turning his back on realities, remembering the political economy of Pig Iron Kelly's book of speeches, ignoring the common comment of business men and bankers of his own political persuasion that the tariff is wrecking our foreign trade and ruining our prospects of recovery, says with a brave smile:

"Administration leaders will not waver on the tariff, despite demands for 'tariff revision' and 'tariff modification.'"

And Senator NYE, swinging a blackthorn with all the facility and felicity of a Donnybrook play boy, says:

"Already there is an invisible but extortionate tax in the form of an indefensibly high tariff. It was handed to the country with the assurance that it would 'protect the American workingman' and increase or maintain prosperity. The result we know. Progressives propose reduction of excessive tariff rates."

And there is the suggestion of a Kilkenny battle in that, too.

VIEWS OF LEADERS DIFFER RADICALLY

The point of view of these two Republicans, representing a distinct and deep cleavage in the President's party, is fundamentally opposed. Thus Senator FESS rhapsodizes on the "prosperity" and sound conditions that have been brought about by the policies of his party for many years. This all seems out of place to Senator NYE, who says:

"Reputable economists have estimated that 8 per cent of our population own 75 per cent of the national wealth. They have stated that 80,000,000 of our population of 125,000,000 have an income of less than $700 a year. Progressives believe that the first duty of government is concerned with the welfare of those 80,000,000 and of millions more who lack economic security."

Could any two views be more remote from one another?

Isn't there more than a suggestion of Donnybrook and Kilkenny here?

SHOULD SEEK HARMONY IN THEIR OWN PARTY

Kind as it is for the supporters of Mr. Hoover to feel distress over the differences among Democrats, and generous as it is to suggest grounds on which they may do battle with one another in the interest of the reelection of Mr. Hoover, it does seem that all their powers of persuasion might better be expended in trying to harmonize the Fesses and the Nyes.

There will be more Democratic harmony in the House than there will be Republican harmony in the Senate.

And, after all, it was a Republican not a Democratic Senator who publicly has informed the President that an announcement that he does not choose to run would earn him the gratitude of the rank and file of his party.

BOND ISSUE FOR PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to send a resolution to the desk, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. BRATTON. Let the resolution be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 94) was read, as follows:

Whereas the paramount problem confronting our Nation to-day is unemployment and public distress; and

Whereas this situation exists at a time when the national wealth is the greatest in our history; and

Whereas there is to-day a surplus of food, clothing, and other necessities of life which can not be purchased by millions of American citizens who want and need them, because they are unable to secure work; and

Whereas this condition has stopped the work of our mills and factories and condemned our people to involuntary idleness; and

Whereas this condition has created a national emergency, which calls for quick and effective action, in order to utilize our national resources for the public welfare: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance is authorized and directed to prepare a bill and report to the Senate at the earliest possible date, said bill to authorize the issue and sale of a Government bond issue of $1,000,000,000, and providing for the expenditure of said money throughout the States in the building of highways, bridges, and other public projects, having in view the doing of such work as will be most useful to the public and employing the maximum amount of human labor, and work that can be begun in each particular locality with the least possible delay.

The Committee on Finance, or any properly authorized subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized to conduct such hearings as may be necessary to determine how the money raised by such bond issue shall be expended to accomplish the purposes hereinbefore set out and to determine what other funds should be raised, and how, for a program of public works throughout the States, and for what purposes and in what manner it should be expended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WATSON. I ask that it may lie over one day.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, may I make a statement before the Senator raises his objection?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. I do not care to make any extended remarks except to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we have now been here some days, we have discussed the moratorium, we have proceeded for some days to the election of a President pro tempore, but so far nothing has been done, no effort has been made in this body, so far as I can recall, to utilize our time in providing any machinery to do whatever the Government can do to relieve the paramount question of unemployment.

It is anticipated that before long we shall probably adjourn for the Christmas holidays. At least 7,000,000 men are out of work, and there is plenty of capital in this country to place them to work in useful public projects. This resolution simply provides, assuming that the Senate is ready to vote a billion dollar bond issue for useful public works, that the Finance Committee shall investigate and determine whether that money could be best spent for highways or public buildings or public bridges, or in what way we could utilize some of our national resources for the purpose of giving employment to men.

If we do not do something of this nature before long, we are going to be confronted with a proposal which probably at that time will be irresistible, that we make contributions out of the Public Treasury to give what some have said would be a dole.

I am simply proposing that now, before that condition arises, the Finance Committee proceed at once to determine how we can best utilize some public money for some public work, to put the maximum amount of human labor at some useful effort.

In connection with that I have requested that we proceed to the immediate consideration of this resolution, rather than to further ballot on who shall be President pro tempore. As a matter of fact, I have been wondering a little bit whether the 7,000,000 unemployed were vitally interested in that proposition. I have been wondering how many people it would feed, to how many people it would give jobs, for us to continue to ballot day after day on who should be President pro tempore of the Senate.

This resolution simply would provide that the Finance Committee investigate and determine whether or not the maximum amount of men would be employed by the building of public highways or by the construction of public building, whether in New York, buildings could be constructed more quickly, perchance, than highways, and whether they would be more necessary. It would result, before we adjourn for the holidays, in our doing that which the whole country is expecting the Senate and the Congress will do, at least to take some time to discuss the paramount question which confronts the people of America.

I desire to give notice that I shall call up this resolution from day to day. I regret that there is objection to it now. I had hoped that there would not be.

I send to the desk and ask to have read a poem which appeared in the Thanksgiving issue of the Washington Herald, written by Mr. George E. Phair, which, it seems to me, would be appropriate to follow the resolution which I have just offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read in the Senator's time.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

THANKSGIVING

By George E. Phair

"I thank Thee, Lord," the workman said,
"For all Thy golden wheat,
Enough to flood the world with bread,
Though I have none to eat.

"I thank Thee for the cotton bales
That tower high in the air
To fend the world from wintry gales
Though I have naught to wear.

"I thank Thee for the whirring wheels
That fashion shoes to wear
Although the stony pavement feels Unkind when soles are bare.

"I thank Thee for the teeming herds
That graze on grasses sweet
Though statesmen fling me empty words
Instead of good red meat.

"And though the landlord's heart is cold
Against my last appeal,
I thank Thee, Lord, for all the gold
That fills our vaults of steel!"

PROPOSED HOLIDAY RECESS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business is the election of a President pro tempore.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before we proceed to the election of a President pro tempore, I would like to ask those having charge of that particular feature of our program what arrangement is being made with reference to adjournment?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, some 10 days ago I took the matter up with the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and he suggested that the House would not be ready to adjourn before the 22d. That will be next Tuesday. I told him that I thought that as far as the Senate was concerned that would probably be satisfactory.

I assume that the Senate would want an adjournment, and probably as many as 25 Senators have come to me in the last two days saying that they intended leaving either Saturday or Monday, and would not remain here after that time. Therefore it becomes just a matter of policy as to what course we should pursue.

I have no advice to give except this, that I am informed—and I think somewhat reliably—that the moratorium bill will pass the House not later than Saturday. If it be sent over here it will be referred to the Committee on Finance, will be taken up possibly on Monday, and might be reported out by Tuesday, and if the House wanted to adjourn on Tuesday, it could not be considered before that day. I am informed by many Senators who want to discuss the moratorium that some time will be required for them to enter into that discussion as fully as they desire.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I may say to the Senator that I have called a meeting of the Finance Committee for to-morrow morning, and I shall at that time bring before the committee the matter referred to by the Senator, with a view, if they agree upon the policy, that we may act, so that when the bill passes the House I may be instructed to put the bill upon its passage immediately. I do not know what action the committee will take, but that is what I am going to ask to have done to-morrow.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. From the information I have I think the Senator from Utah may dispense with the hope he has expressed, because I am quite confident that the committee will not go through with any such procedure if the bill is passed by the House.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not desirous of putting any limit on the consideration of the moratorium bill or any other measure. What I wanted to ascertain was what the program was. Are we going to adjourn Saturday until the 4th or 5th of January?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, inasmuch as the House is preparing to adjourn on Tuesday, and inasmuch as a third if not a half of the Members of the Senate will be absent on Monday, it appears to me that what we ought to do is to adjourn from Saturday to Tuesday, and then adjourn for the holidays.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not going to take the time now, but I am utterly opposed to that program, and when the time comes I am going to interpose my objection.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the election of a President pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. AUSTIN (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and withhold my vote. If the junior Senator from Utah were present, he would vote for Senator PITTMAN, and if I were at liberty to vote I would vote for Senator MOSES.

Mr. COPELAND (when his name was called). I have a pair to-day with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote for Senator PITTMAN. If the Senator from Colorado were present, he would vote for Senator MOSES.

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). I have a pair to-day with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. If he were present, he would vote for Senator PITTMAN, and if I were permitted to vote I would vote for Senator MOSES.

Mr. MCNARY (when Mr. JONES's name was called). The senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is absent on important work. On this vote he is paired with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is absent. If he were present, he would vote for Senator MOSES, and if I were at liberty to vote I would vote for Senator PITTMAN.

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). On this and all votes connected with this question I am paired with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (when his name was called.) I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], who is detained at home on account of illness. I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and vote for Senator MOSES. I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], were he present, would vote for Senator MOSES.

Mr. SHEPPARD (when the name of Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma was called). The senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], being unavoidably absent, is paired with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN]. If the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] were present, he would vote for Senator PITTMAN.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] is necessarily detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. BULKLEY (after having voted for Senator PITTMAN). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY]. I understand he is absent on official business. If he were present, he would vote for Senator MOSES. I am therefore constrained to withdraw my vote for Senator PITTMAN.

Mr. WAGNER (after having voted for Senator PITTMAN). Has the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. WAGNER. I have a general pair with that Senator and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. HASTINGS. I have previously announced my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] and vote for Senator MOSES.

The result was announced as follows:

FOR SENATOR PITTMAN—36

Ashurst	Caraway	Harris	Neely
Bailey	Connally	Hawes	Robinson, Ark.
Bankhead	Coolidge	Hayden	Sheppard
Barkley	Costigan	Hull	Smith
Black	Dill	Kendrick	Trammell
Bratton	Fletcher	Lewis	Tydings
Broussard	George	McGill	Walsh, Mass.
Bulow	Glass	McKellar	Walsh, Mont.
Byrnes	Gore	Morrison	Wheeler

FOR SENATOR MOSES—26

Barbour	Hatfield	Norbeck	Steiwer
Bingham	Hebert	Oddie	Townsend
Dale	Johnson	Reed	Vandenberg
Dickinson	Kean	Robinson, Ind.	Watson
Goldsborough	Keyes	Schall	White
Hale	McNary	Shortridge
Hastings	Metcalf	Smoot

FOR SENATOR VANDENBERG—13

Blaine	Couzens	La Follette	Thomas, Idaho
Borah	Cutting	Norris
Brookhart	Frazier	Nye
Capper	Howell	Shipstead

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this ballot 36 votes were cast for Senator PITTMAN, 26 for Senator MOSES, and 13 for Senator VANDENBERG. A total of 75 votes were cast, 38 being necessary for a choice. No one having received a majority of votes cast, there is no election. The clerk will again call the roll.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, anticipating that another ballot will be had within a few moments and remembering vividly what the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] said yesterday respecting this impasse, I am at this juncture going to make a point of order against any further balloting or voting for President pro tempore unless the rule of the Senate is strictly observed. I ask that the esteemed Vice President advert to clause 1 of Rule I, which reads as follows:

> In the absence of the Vice President, the Senate shall choose a President pro tempore.

I make the point that the Senate has no authority or jurisdiction to proceed to vote for a President pro tempore unless and until the Vice President is absent. He is not absent; he is present. That is the rule, and I ask the Chair to read the same.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to call the attention of the Senator from Arizona to a resolution which was adopted by the Senate in 1890, as follows:

> Resolved, That it is competent for the Senate to elect a President pro tempore, who shall hold the office during the pleasure of the Senate and until another is elected, and shall execute the duties thereof during all future absences of the Vice President until the Senate otherwise order.

Mr. ASHURST. May I be permitted respectfully to observe that the resolution which the Vice President just read in no way contravenes and is in no sense in opposition to or contradictory of the present rule. It is true that the President pro tempore holds his office until his successor is elected. I think there is no Senator here who doubts that. But we must give some meaning to the plain wording of this rule—and it is the first clause of the first rule—viz:

> In the absence of the Vice President, the Senate shall choose a President pro tempore.

Then, not content with that language, not content with that emphasis, the next clause begins, "In the absence of the Vice President," and so forth. I respectfully insist that the Senate has no authority to proceed to the election of a President pro tempore unless and until the Vice President is absent. I distinctly recall, and will ask Senators to look at the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in support of my statement, that in 1915, or thereabouts, whilst Vice President Marshall was in the chair, a motion was made to proceed to the election of a President pro tempore, and, upon a point of order being made, the Vice President left the chair before we proceeded to the election of a President pro tempore.

This has grown into a serious matter, and I am emboldened to make the point of order because of the pertinent and statesmanlike remarks of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] that the country expects action on the part of the Senate, expects business to be transacted, and yet here we are engaged in a futile struggle to elect a President pro tempore while the Presiding Officer, the constitutional officer, the Vice President, is not absent, but is here. I insist upon my point of order.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ASHURST. With pleasure.

Mr. DILL. If the rule is literally complied with, who will preside over the Senate while the Senate is choosing a President pro tempore?

Mr. ASHURST. The President pro tempore, if he be present. If he be absent, he may designate some one under our rules.

Mr. DILL. But there is no President pro tempore.

Mr. ASHURST. Oh, yes; he is a continuing officer.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose—and the rule was made with this in view—that there were no President pro tempore; who would preside?

Mr. ASHURST. Then the Secretary of the Senate would preside.

Mr. NORRIS. I was merely anxious that the Senator should provide us with a presiding officer.

Mr. ASHURST. I insist with the seriousness which always accompanies what I say that the point of order be decided now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that when the resolution to which he previously referred was adopted, the practice prevailed of electing a President pro tempore every day, or when the occasion arose; sometimes it was every day. An argument was made at the time that the question should be settled and the Senate should be authorized to elect a President pro tempore. The resolution to which the Chair referred was adopted to avoid the necessity of electing a President pro tempore every time the Vice President was absent. Therefore the Chair overrules the point of order raised by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I shall not appeal from the ruling, but I do not wish it to stand as an unopposed and unprotested precedent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The protest of the Senator will be entered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BULKLEY (when his name was called). In the absence of the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], with whom I am paired, I withhold my vote. If present, the junior Senator from Wyoming would vote for Senator MOSES, and if I were free to vote I would vote for Senator PITTMAN.

Mr. COPELAND (when his name was called). Repeating my statement regarding my pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN], I withhold my vote.

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore with regard to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). For reasons given on the previous roll call I withhold my vote.

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement of my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the preceding ballot, transferring my general pair, I vote for Senator MOSES

Mr. SHEPPARD (when the name of Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma was called). The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN]. If the Senator from Oklahoma were present, he would vote for Senator PITTMAN.

Mr. WAGNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WHEELER (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING]. If permitted to vote, I should vote for Senator PITTMAN.

Mr. McNARY. I wish again to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] on important work and his pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

The roll call having been concluded, resulted:

FOR SENATOR PITTMAN—36

Ashurst	Caraway	Harris	Morrison
Bailey	Connally	Hawes	Neely
Bankhead	Coolidge	Hayden	Robinson, Ark.
Barkley	Costigan	Hull	Sheppard

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this ballot Senator PITTMAN has received 36 votes, Senator MOSES 27, and Senator McNARY 12. There have been cast 75 votes; necessary for a choice, 38. No Senator having received a majority of the votes cast, there is no election.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, again announcing my determination not to be considered in connection with this office, I shall cast my vote on the next ballot for Senator MOSES.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT, as in executive session, laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States making sundry judicial nominations, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

[For nominations this day received see the end of Senate proceedings.]

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. WATSON. I move that the Senate adjourn, the adjournment being until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, December 16, 1931, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate December 15, 1931

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT JUDGES

James M. Morton, jr., of Massachusetts, to be United States circuit judge, first circuit. (To succeed George W. Anderson, retired.)

Morris A. Soper, of Maryland, to be United States circuit judge, fourth circuit, to succeed Edmund Waddill, jr., deceased. (Mr. Soper is now serving under a recess appointment.)

UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGES

W. Calvin Chesnut, of Maryland, to be United States district judge, district of Maryland, to succeed Morris A. Soper, appointed United States circuit judge, fourth circuit. (Mr. Chesnut is now serving under a recess appointment.)

John Knight, of New York, to be United States district judge, western district of New York, to succeed John R. Hazel, resigned. (Mr. Knight is now serving under a recess appointment.)

James Alger Fee, of Oregon, to be United States district judge, district of Oregon, to succeed Robert S. Bean, deceased. (Mr. Fee is now serving under a recess appointment.)

Robert J. McMillan, of Texas, to be United States district judge, western district of Texas. (To succeed DuVal West, retired.)

John Paul, of Virginia, to be United States district judge, western district of Virginia. (To succeed Henry C. McDowell, retired.)

ASSOCIATE JUSTICES OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

F. Dickinson Letts, of Iowa, to be an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, to succeed Wendell Phillips Stafford, resigned. (Mr. Letts is now serving under a recess appointment.)

Daniel W. O'Donoghue, of the District of Columbia, to be an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, to succeed Frederick L. Siddons, deceased. (Mr. O'Donoghue is now serving under a recess appointment.)

ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL

Roy St. Lewis, of Oklahoma, to be Assistant Attorney General, to succeed George R. Farnum, resigned. (Mr. St. Lewis is now serving under a recess appointment.)

UNITED STATES ATTORNEYS

Arthur B. Chilton, of Alabama, to be United States attorney, middle district of Alabama, to succeed Grady Reynolds, term expired. (Mr. Chilton is now serving under a recess appointment.)

Leroy M. Sullivan, of Alaska, to be United States attorney, district of Alaska, division No. 2, to succeed Julius Harold Hart, resigned. (Mr. Sullivan is now serving under a recess appointment.)

Paul F. Jones, of Illinois, to be United States attorney, eastern district of Illinois, to succeed Harold G. Baker, term expired. (Mr. Jones is now serving under a recess appointment.)

Charles A. Jonas, of North Carolina, to be United States attorney, western district of North Carolina, to succeed Thomas J. Harkins, resigned. Mr. Jonas is now serving under a recess appointment.)

Herbert K. Hyde, of Oklahoma, to be United States attorney, western district of Oklahoma, to succeed Roy St. Lewis, resigned. (Mr. Hyde is now serving under a recess appointment.)

Robert H. Talley, of Virginia, to be United States attorney, eastern district of Virginia, to succeed Paul W. Kear, resigned. (Mr. Talley is now serving under a recess appointment.)

UNITED STATES MARSHALS

Samuel Purvis, of Georgia, to be United States marshal, middle district of Georgia. (He is now serving in his position under an appointment which expired December 22, 1930.)

Allen B. Kale, of South Carolina, to be United States marshal, eastern district of South Carolina, to succeed Samuel J. Leaphart, term expired. (Mr. Kale is now serving under a recess appointment.)

G. Fred Flanders, of Georgia, to be United States marshal, southern district of Georgia, to succeed George B. McLeod, term expired. (Mr. Flanders is now serving under a recess appointment.)

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1931

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Father Frederick J. Bergs, Milwaukee, Wis., offered the following prayer:

Pour forth, we beseech Thee, O Lord, Thy grace into the hearts of these Thy servants who are assembled here in this distinguished body to deliberate and to help to decide over the present and future destinies of our country. Enkindle their hearts with a true desire to perform their duties properly, and give them to understand the magnitude of the power and authority entrusted to them through Thy delegation from the people. Let not rancor or party spirit bedim and sway their judgment in the momentous questions presented to them for discussion, so that the result of their findings may be of benefit to our Nation and pleasing in Thy sight.

Bless these, Thy servants. Bless our Chief Executive and all our public officials, and give them strength to rightfully and truthfully perform the duties of the office assigned to them. Have mercy on Thy people also, O Lord; and if it please Thee, take away from us the visitation which Thou hast permitted to come over them and the nations of the world. Help us to obey Thy divine commandments, so that all our acts and deeds may react to the benefit of our land and humanity and redound to your honor and glory. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE NATIONAL BUDGET AND THE PUBLIC CREDIT

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech made by the Under Secretary of the Treasury entitled "The National Budget and Public Credit."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by Hon. Ogden L. Mills, Under Secretary of the Treasury, before the Economic Club of New York, at the Hotel Astor, Monday evening, December 14, 1931.

The address is as follows:

You have invited me to discuss this evening the financial position of the United States Government and the many fiscal problems which confront our Government in these difficult times. I was very pleased indeed to accept, for I know of no subject in which all of our people, irrespective of whether they contribute directly to the Federal Government or not, are more vitally interested, or one which it is more important that they should understand. Adequate comprehension and support on the part of the Nation is essential to the Government in the performance of its fiscal functions.

We closed the last fiscal year with a deficit of $903,000,000. We are confronted this year with a prospective deficit of $2,123,000,000, and it is estimated that expenditures will exceed receipts by no less than $1,417,000,000 in the fiscal year 1933. If we contrast these figures with a surplus of $184,000,000 in 1930, one of $185,000,000 in 1929, and of $399,000,000 in 1928, we are shocked at the violence and suddenness of the change. For, while I am sorry to say that a falling off in income is an all too common experience these days, yet our Federal Government is so strong and our national resources are so great that somehow or other we feel that our Government should be superior to the ills to which individual citizens are subject. Indeed, there is so much truth in this conception that, as we shall see, the Government has but to make a further call upon available resources to put its financial house in order.

To grasp not only what has happened in the immediate past but what should be done in the immediate future it is necessary to understand our revenue system, and to note the essential fact that it rests on a very narrow base. Take the fiscal year 1930 as an example: We find that in that year, out of total receipts from taxation of $3,626,000,000, no less than $2,411,000,000, or two-thirds, was contributed by income-tax payers, corporate and individual; $587,000,000, or 16 per cent, from customs duties; and $628,000,000, or 17 per cent, from miscellaneous internal-revenue taxes, of which the tax on tobacco contributed $450,000,000 and the stamp taxes, chiefly on the issue and transfer of securities, about $69,000,000.

These taxes are comparatively few in number, and all, with the exception of the tobacco taxes, which have steadily grown in years of prosperity and remained comparatively stable even under adverse conditions, are susceptible to very wide variations, in accordance with changing business conditions. This is obviously true in the case of customs receipts, which, with imports reduced both in quantity and value, fell from $587,000,000 in the fiscal year 1930 to $378,000,000 in 1931. The direct relationship between business prosperity and the net income of corporations, upon which the income tax is based, needs no elaboration, and the sharp drop from $1,118,000,000 collected in 1930 to the $550,000,000 which it is estimated we will collect in 1932 is but another indication of the extent of the depression. A falling off in activity in the security markets must be accompanied by a sharp reduction in receipts from stamp taxes.

But it is when we come to the income tax on individuals that the dangers incident to too narrow a tax base are most strikingly exemplified. The number of individual returns for the calendar year 1928 aggregated 4,071,000. Of this number, 382,000 taxpayers contributed $1,128,000,000 and the other 3,689,000 individuals who made returns contributed but $36,000,000. Clearly, under our system large and moderately large incomes bear practically the full burden of the individual income tax. Now, these incomes, as we shall see, are the very ones subject to the widest fluctuations, since they include business profits, and more particularly because in recent years the element of gain and loss resulting from the purchase and sale of capital assets has had on them a preponderating influence. In so far as tax receipts are concerned, these fluctuations are magnified by our progressive rates which necessarily result in taxes rising at a more rapid rate than incomes as the latter move forward into higher and, on the other hand, falling with greater abruptness as they recede into lower brackets.

Taxes returned on individual incomes fell from $1,164,000,000 for the calendar year 1928 to $474,000,000, according to available information, for 1930. The number of returns of those with incomes of from $5,000 to $10,000 fell from 561,000 to 506,000, while the tax paid fell from $21,000,000 to $17,000,000, or 22 per cent. Of those with incomes from $10,000 to $100,000, the number fell from 360,000 to 252,000, and the tax from $409,000,000 to $208,000,000, or 49 per cent, while of those with incomes of $100,000 and over the number fell from 15,780 to 6,152, and the tax from $700,000,000 to $238,000,000, or 66 per cent.

While income from all sources declined, the one chiefly responsible for this almost perpendicular drop was gains from the sale of capital assets.

If we take the returns of individuals with net incomes of $5,000 and over, we find that the aggregate net income returned fell from $16,299,000,000, in 1928, to $10,119,000,000, in 1930, or a decrease of $6,180,000,000, and of this amount no less than $4,230,000,000, or about 68 per cent, is accounted for by the reduction in net profits in excess of losses, resulting from the sale of capital assets.

The question of taking into consideration, in the determination of taxable income, gains and losses from the purchase and sale of capital assets, has been the subject of much discussion. Many people believe that this feature of our income tax law should be eliminated, on the ground that it tends to promote, rather than to discourage, speculation in periods of expansion, and that it has a depressing effect in times of recession. I am inclined to think that this criticism is too sweeping, and that the supporting data is inadequate. Does anyone really believe that events would have been very different if we had had no income tax? If so, how are we to account for similar experiences in the past? And if it be urged that the magnitude of this folly was greater than ever before, my answer is that we made bigger fools of ourselves this time because our resources and the opportunities afforded us were infinitely greater. Certain it is that over a 10-year period this particular provision of our income-tax law has been extremely fruitful. Moreover, we must not forget that our conception of capital gain as income is an integral part of our income tax law, woven into its structure, and that it can not be eliminated without a complete rewriting of the law, and undoing the results of many years of trial and uncertainty, during which the interpretation of the law became clarified through administrative and court decision, and its administration reached a point where certainty began to take the place of arbitrariness and blind groping. Do we want to travel back over that long hard trail for so doubtful a benefit? For who can contend, as a matter of principle, that the handsome gain yielded without effort by a quick turn in the market is a less legitimate object of taxation than a hard-earned salary or the remuneration of doctors, lawyers, engineers, and other professional men, whose earning capacity is developed only through years of constant application and unremitting effort?

In passing, while we are on the subject of income-tax statistics, there is a fallacy which I would like to correct. When the figures for the calendar year 1929 were published a number of gentlemen who think that all is for the worst in the worst of worlds claimed that here at last was the final decisive proof of the concentration of wealth in the United States in a few hands. They eagerly seized on the fact that 504 individuals reported incomes of a million and over, and that no less than 967 individuals had reported incomes of between $500,000 and a million; but when the returns for 1930 came in, we found that the former group had shrunk to 149 and the latter to 311, as compared with 206 and 376, respectively, in 1916. On the other hand, the number of individuals returning incomes of from $5,000 to $10,000 had grown from 150,000, in 1916, to 505,000, in 1930. The truth is that income-tax returns in any given year are unreliable guides in estimating the distribution of national income or wealth.

To summarize, our Federal Government relies on a very limited number of taxes, subject, generally speaking, to extreme fluctuations. It places its chief reliance on an income tax which, because of the character of its structure and the narrowness of its base, is susceptible to sharp increases and precipitous drops. As a result, our Budget lacks stability and is particularly vulnerable to a depression as sweeping as the one which has overtaken us. In consequence, our total receipts from taxation have shrunk from $3,626,000,000, in the fiscal year 1930, to an estimated $2,094,000,000, in the current fiscal year. Of this loss of $1,530,000,000, no less than $1,271,000,000 is accounted for by a falling off in income-tax collections.

In the meanwhile, expenditures are estimated at $4,482,000,000 for 1932, compared with an actual total of $3,994,000,000 for 1930, an increase of about $490,000,000. Of this increase approximately $350,000,000 is attributable to the estimated increase in expenditures for construction activities, including additional work on roads, public buildings, and a variety of emergency construction activities. It is estimated that the Veterans' Administration will require $231,000,000 more in 1932 than in 1930, reflecting an increase of $88,000,000 in funds required to meet loans to veterans on adjusted-service certificates and an increase of $143,000,000 for military and naval compensations and other services for veterans. Expenditures for the postal deficiency will be $103,000,000 larger than in 1930. The more important decreases include $54,000,000 for interest paid on the public debt, largely as a result of lower interest rates; $145,000,000 for public retirements principally due to the proposed postponement of payments by foreign governments for 1932, and $68,000,000 for refunds of receipts. It should be observed that total expenditures for 1932, aggregating almost $4,500,000,000, include about $1,000,000,000 for interest on the public debt and sinking-fund retirements and a similar amount to cover expenditures for veterans of all wars. Neither of these major outlays is subject to reduction at will, so that the opportunity for reducing expenditures is limited to the balance of some $2,500,000,000. Present estimates indicate a reduction in expenditures between 1932 and 1933 of about $370,000,000.

It is estimated that we will close the fiscal year 1932 with a deficit of $2,123,000,000. The outlook for 1933 is, however, a little more cheerful. Revenue from taxation rises from $2,094,000,000 to $2,168,000,000, and total receipts from $2,359,000,000 to $2,696,000,000, while, as I have pointed out, expenditures are cut by about $370,000,000, still leaving, however, an estimated deficit of $1,417,000,000. The combined deficits for the three years aggregate approximately $4,400,000,000, and, after deducting debt retirements effected through the sinking fund and by virtue of other statutory requirements, indicate an increase in the public debt of approximately $3,250,000,000.

There is the situation. Before discussing, however, why something must be done about it, and what that something should be, let us glance briefly at our public-debt figures. These have a direct bearing on the national credit. The problem of inadequate revenue and excessive expenditures can not be considered solely from the standpoint of providing for our immediate needs. The effect which these two diverging factors, unless remedied, will have on the public credit is of infinitely greater concern. Its maintenance is of supreme importance to us all.

Our gross debt, which had fallen steadily from $25,485,000,000, on June 30, 1919, to $16,185,000,000, on June 30, 1930, increased to $17,310,000,000 on November 30, 1931. In addition, during the past 17 months Government securities in the hands of the public were increased by $850,000,000 through the liquidation of Treasury notes held in the adjusted-service certificate fund in connection with the financing of additional loans to veterans, chiefly as a result of the legislation enacted at the last session of Congress. Of the total interest-bearing debt, aggregating $17,040,000,000, $14,310,000,000 consists of long-term bonds, some of which are callable in 1932, others in 1933; after the December financing, about $2,200,000,000 of open-market issues of certificates and notes having maturities of a year or less; and some $576,000,000 of 90-day issues of Treasury bills. These last may be rolled over, and offer, therefore, no particular problem. Thanks to three bond issues, made in March, June, and September, and the reduction effected in our short-term debt since January 1, 1931, the difficulties of financing the deficit in the current year have been lessened. The $2,200,000,000 of certificates and notes can readily be handled in quarterly tax-payment months, particularly as all of the quarter-days, beginning January 1, 1933, are open. But if we are called upon to finance, through borrowing, another huge deficit in 1933, and all manner of unwise and uneconomic expenditures in the meanwhile, leaving aside for the moment the general effect of the credit of the Government, our difficulties become very serious indeed. In November, 1933, $6,268,000,000 of Fourth Liberty Loan 4¼ per cent bonds become callable. They mature as early as 1938, and this immense issue must be retired or refunded over the comparatively short period of five years.

If, on the other hand, the increase in the public debt can be arrested during the fiscal year 1933, the Treasury's general debt retirement and refunding program, somewhat modified, of course, by the events of the last two years, is definitely manageable.

I do not mean to suggest that the addition of $3,000,000,000, or even $4,000,000,000, to our national debt could conceivably impair the national credit. That debt stood at $25,000,000,000 a decade ago, and the national credit was unimpaired; but I do say, with all the force at my command, that any temporizing with this situation, any failure to take the steps necessary to bring our Budget into balance within a reasonable time, any misuse of the public credit would furnish such evidence of lack of sound financial principles as might well result in shaken confidence and in apprehension lest these conditions prevail long enough to result in real damage. Our long-term bonds are selling to-day at a discount, even those bearing as high an interest rate as 3¾ per cent. Allowing for tightened money conditions and for all the unusual circumstances which surround us, there is no doubt but that some of the weakness manifested reflects the response of the investing public to the possibility that we may be confronted with a rapid increase in the public debt and in the volume of Government securities outstanding. There is fear of further huge grants to veterans; there is fear of major drains on the Treasury through uneconomic expenditures; there is fear of growing and unremedied deficits. All of this fear can be swept away only by adherence to sound financial principles and the development of a program of restricted expenditures and of increased revenues, which, if they do call for temporary sacrifices on the part of our people, will, in the long run, bring them infinite benefit.

In this period of deep uncertainty the unimpaired credit of the Federal Government is the most priceless possession of the people of the United States. We assume its existence as we assume the continuance of unlimited supplies of air and sunlight. It has been established through the pursuance of sound fiscal policy in the past and so must it now be preserved. The immediate cost in increased taxes is small in comparison with the immediate and lasting benefit to the Nation.

Let me at this point take the liberty of quoting briefly from the speech of a very great man, the late Senator Dwight Morrow, who, in describing how individuals take their own money with its present command over goods and services and surrender it not only to their own Government but to the governments of nations on the other side of the earth and receive in exchange for it a promise, went on to say:

"The question may be asked: Nothing more than a promise? To which answer may be made: Nothing less than a promise.

"I remember reading some years ago a letter of Thomas Bailey Aldrich written to William Dean Howells. Aldrich is writing of a friend who has just died and whose body is resting in 'a dismal London burying ground.' He says to Howells that it is not worth three pins to be a great novelist or a great general or a great anything else. Then he winds up his letter with this whimsical expression: 'Yet with a sort of hopeful vivacity I have just bought two 5 per cent railway bonds that expire in 1967. Who will be cutting off the coupons long before that? Not I.' There was Aldrich, despondent because of the transitoriness of life, taking his savings and putting them in railway bonds that matured long after his life would end. Every day investors are buying bonds, domestic and foreign, although they have every reason to wonder who will collect the coupons. Human lives stop. Promises go on. The civilized world to-day is run on the basis of a belief in promises. Whatever our doubts about the meaning of modern civilization, we may at least take some comfort in the trust which men show in each other's promises."

Now, this belief in promises, this credit structure of ours, depends to a very great extent upon the confident belief that the Government will meet its financial obligations promptly and punctiliously, on every occasion and in every emergency. Our currency rests predominantly upon the credit of the United States. Impair that credit and every dollar you handle will be tainted with suspicion. The foundation of our commercial-credit system, the Federal reserve banks, and all other banks which depend upon them, are inextricably tied into and dependent upon the credit of the United States Government. Impair that credit to-day, and the day after thousands of development projects—they are still going on—will stop; thousands of business men dependent upon credit renewals will get refusals from their bankers; thousands of mortgages that would otherwise be renewed or extended, will be foreclosed. Merchants who would buy on credit will cancel orders; factories that would manufacture on part capacity at least will close down.

It is true that a distressingly large minority of the wage earners of this country are now out of work. But we must not forget that a majority still have enough work to make a living. We have lost much; but we have infinitely more to lose.

What we still have, what we hope for in the future, are dependent in a large degree upon the preservation, unimpaired, of the credit of the United States. It will cost something to preserve it. The cost is additional taxation. The wealthy, the captains of industry, the bankers, must contribute to meet this cost; but the small business man, the white-collar man, the farmer, and the wage earner have an equally vital stake in the preservation of the Nation's credit. The new taxes will cut into the incomes of the rich, and they will affect by some small amount the contributions made to the Government by those in moderate circumstances. But the result—the preservation of the Nation's credit—is worth this cost, and for that matter, an even much greater one, to all who are called upon to make some temporary sacrifice.

It is sometimes urged that, since in the course of eleven years prior to the fiscal year 1931 we had retired some $3,460,000,000 of debt from surplus receipts, we are justified in incurring deficits up to that amount. There is some force to the argument. We have created something in the nature of a reserve which we are warranted in drawing on, certainly to some extent. But there are definite limitations. In the first place, in the early years of the decade a large part of the current surpluses were due to the sale or other disposal of capital assets the returns from which could most properly be applied to debt reduction, and other receipts of a nonrecurring character. In the second place, when the sinking fund was created, it was assumed that loans to foreign governments would be repaid in full, and would be applicable to the retirement of a very large part of our public debt; whereas the amounts due us from abroad have since then been whittled down by the debt-funding agreements. And, finally, even if we assume that we are justified in borrowing up to the full amount of $3,460,000,000, that sum will be almost absorbed by last year's and this year's deficits.

As the Secretary of the Treasury pointed out in his annual report, there are certain basic principles in the conduct of public finances which can not be disregarded by any nation. First, the sinking fund, designed for gradual retirement of the public debt, must be maintained, and when of necessity the public debt is increasing, the regular sinking-fund appropriations must be accepted in the accounts of the Government as fixed charges against revenues. Second, over a period of years, revenues must be equal to expenditures. Deficiency for a time may be inevitable, but the principle of a balanced budget must never be abandoned; and when emergency conditions upset the balance, every effort must be made to restore it at the earliest possible opportunity.

Bearing constantly in mind that additional taxes should not be so great as to retard the business recovery, upon which the restoration of the normal flow of revenue depends, the Treasury program submitted to the Congress last Wednesday has three definite objectives: First, a reduction in the prospective deficit this fiscal year; second, no further increase in the public debt in the fiscal year 1933; third, a balanced budget in 1934. We do not feel justified in asking for more; we would have failed in our duty had we recommended less.

The attainment of our goals necessitates additional revenue in excess of $900,000,000 in the year 1933. In the development of a program we considered many forms of taxation. We weighed, for instance, the merits of the general sales or turnover tax, but rejected it, not only because it bears no relation to ability to pay and is regressive in character but because of the enormous administrative difficulties and the almost inevitable pyramiding of the tax in the course of successive sales.

We studied the limited manufacturers' or producers' sales tax, which is being administered with a fair degree of success in Canada. In Canada a tax is imposed at the rate of 4 per cent on the manufacturers' sale price, or the import value of all goods not exempt, which are produced or manufactured in Canada or imported into Canada. Retailers are exempt. It is distinctly not a turnover tax. Practically all raw materials of farms, mines, fisheries, etc., are exempt, as are most small manufacturers and producers, such as custom tailors, shoemakers, plumbers, opticians, et al. The extent of the exemptions is very great. They fill 10 closely printed pages and cover thousands of specific items and classes of items. Pyramiding is avoided by a mechanism of licenses and certificates. Every manufacturer and wholesaler is required to take out a license. If one licensed manufacturer buys from another licensed manufacturer or licensed wholesaler, he notes his certificate number on the order; this is noted on the sales invoice, and the sale is exempt.

When the last licensed taxpayer sells to an unlicensed purchaser the tax is collected. Administrative discretion is granted to an extent unheard of in this country and which I doubt whether our Congress would ever be willing to grant. Not only has the Minister of Finance final power to fix the wholesale price or value to which the tax rate is applied in uncertain cases, not only are deductions and refunds discretionary, but from 1922 until 1931 the governor in council had power to exempt articles from the sales tax. The success of the tax appears to be due not only to good administration but to this very wide administrative discretion. The tax is unquestionably passed on and adds, therefore, to the cost of living.

With some 200,000 manufacturing establishments in the United States, our much more extensive and complicated industrial mechanism, our tendency to set out administrative procedure with almost meticulous accuracy in our statutes, and our reluctance to grant administrative discretion or the authority to administrative officers to make final decisions, it is more than doubtful whether the Canadian sales tax would meet with the success in our country than it has across the border. Certain it is that many months would elapse before the necessary administrative machinery could be set up and a number of years before such a new form of taxation could be firmly established in this country. And we are in need of additional revenue now.

In any event, we concluded that, on the whole, it is wiser for us to resort to those forms of taxation with which we have had experience and are thoroughly familiar rather than to embark on new and untried ventures. If this conception is sound, we have but to take a step backward and to relinquish temporarily the benefits of the tax reductions effected in the period of expanding revenues. It isn't necessary to retrace many steps and to return either to the revenue act of 1918 or of 1921, but what we desire can be accomplished by returning in principle to the general plan of taxation existing under the revenue act of 1924, with such changes as are appropriate in the light of existing conditions.

The advantages of such a program are manifest. From an administrative standpoint we have not only had the necessary experience but we are so organized as to take on this new burden without difficulty. From the standpoint of the taxpayer and of the Nation there is no occasion for alarm, for we are simply reimposing upon ourselves for the time being taxes which we didn't find too burdensome and the existence of which proved no impediment to business expansion and growing prosperity.

It is unnecessary to describe the program in detail, for I doubt not all of you have read it with interest and I trust without concern. Generally speaking, it provides for the retention and in some instances an increase in existing excise taxes; a restoration of the manufacturers' sales tax on automobiles, trucks, and accessories; of the stamp tax on conveyances of realty; and of the tax on telephone, telegraph, radio, and cable messages; and the imposition of new taxes on manufacturers' sales of radio and phonograph equipment and on checks and drafts. The rate of tax on corporate income is increased but slightly, from 12 to 12½ per cent. We have refrained from recommending the restoration of the capital-stock tax, which was in the 1924 law, not only because it was an unfair and unequal tax, involving most difficult administrative problems, but with a view to placing not too great a burden on business at the present time. A return to the 1924 act necessarily involves a sharp increase in the rates applicable to individual incomes and the taxing of many taxpayers who since 1924, owing to very high exemptions, have been relieved from the obligation of contributing to the support of their Government, though enjoying a very genuine ability to contribute certainly the very moderate amounts demanded by the 1924 act.

When the 1924 act was before the House of Representatives, no one fought harder than I did to reduce the rates to the point later established by the 1926 act. I believed then, and I believe now, that under normal conditions a 20 per cent rate is sounder than a 40 per cent rate, not only from the standpoint of our general economy but, in the long run, from the standpoint of productivity. But these are not normal times. There is an emergency, and we are proposing emergency measures to meet it. Men who still have very large incomes can not object, under the circumstances, to contributing largely. Men with comparatively large incomes should be willing to do their share, and those in more moderate but comfortable circumstances will surely feel that they can spare something for the support of their Government. I am confident that, if only there be a proper understanding of the necessities of the case, the temporary sacrifices demanded will be met, if not joyfully, at least wholeheartedly and with philosophy and good humor.

After all, even in these days which appear so dark, we are still fortunate as contrasted with other nations. After a hard-boiled Treasury has done its worst—and when you gloomily view the approach of the ides of March, I suggest that you place these figures on your desk as you make out your income-tax return: A married man with one dependent, and with an income of $5,000, will pay, under our Treasury's proposal, $31.50 in taxes; a man similarly situated in Great Britain pays, under Mr. Snowden's latest budget proposals, $650. A man with an income of $10,000 pays $153 in the United States and $1,800 in Great Britain. One with $100,000 pays $22,030 in the United States and $48,000 in Great Britain. We would grant an exemption of $1,500 for a single man, $2,500 for a married man and $400 for each dependent. Great Britain's exemptions are as follows: For a single man, $485; for a married man, $730; for the first dependent child, $245; and for each other child, $195.

If our program is adopted, it is estimated that we shall obtain during the full fiscal year 1933 an additional $60,000,000 from corporations, $185,000,000 from individual income taxpayers, $11,000,000 additional from estates, and $514,000,000 additional from miscellaneous internal-revenue taxes. In addition, we have recommended that postal rates be so adjusted that the Post Office Department's revenues will cover, by a reasonable margin, its expenditures, exclusive of such special services as the cost of free postal services performed for Government departments and agencies, the excess of the cost of air mail services over revenues, and the cost of special rates paid to ocean mail carriers under American registry. There is no reason why the public should not pay the cost of the service it receives from the Post Office Department, or why the latter, as an essentially business institution, should not be self-supporting.

I have no illusions as to the feelings with which a program of drastic tax increases is received, and I can assure you that it is anything but a pleasant task to participate in the preparation and submission of such a program, but no man, whether he be a Treasury official or a taxpayer, can open-mindedly examine the existing situation and not reach the conclusion that the alternative for increased taxation is infinitely worse for the Nation. I find some consolation in the thought that the contribution to be made by people with moderate incomes is still fairly light, and that those whose incomes remain in the upper brackets in times like these are in such a preferred class as to occasion little concern for them, though if circumstances permitted I should much prefer to see them buy bonds rather than pay additional income taxes. When we come to the miscellaneous group, the rates are not so high as to interfere with the flow of goods or services, or to constitute a real burden on those who buy or enjoy them. Can we seriously complain if cigarettes and radios and admissions to places of amusement—yes, even seminecessities such as automobiles—are to cost a trifle more, or if we are to pay 2 cents for the privilege of using checks and an additional cent on transfer of securities? These are not intolerable burdens, particularly when we are asked to assume them to meet the necessities of a real emergency.

But, let me add that if the people of the United States make this sacrifice and furnish almost a billion dollars of additional funds to their Government, they have the right to insist, and I hope that they will, that not one penny is expended extravagantly, politically, or unwisely, but that just as enforced rigid economy prevails throughout the country so will it be observed in Washington.

Let me close with a general observation or two. The problems at home and abroad which appear so great are not insoluble. They will yield readily enough to a resolute, courageous, and intelligent attack. The real difficulties in the present situation are those inherent in human nature, in the element of fear which seems to possess the souls of men in the face of an uncertain future, and in fixed conceptions and attitudes. There is more to fear from frozen minds than frozen assets. We can not look to governments or to a few leaders. The necessary measures must be taken and the recuperative forces must be set in motion by the great masses of the people themselves.

But if the nations and the individuals who compose them, laying aside preconceived notions, prejudices, and above all, fear, will face the realities of the situation and will look to the future rather than to the past, then we can fairly hope to emerge from this deep valley at a comparatively early period. There must, of course, be guidance and leadership, but the real responsibility rests on each and every one of us, and our failure to meet our daily problems with intelligence and courage is not only a betrayal of others but of our own cause.

CONTROL OF LIQUOR TRAFFIC

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article printed in the Providence Bulletin, which contains an interview with me on a constitutional amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Reserving the right to object, it is understood that these are the gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

There was no objection.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Providence Bulletin which contains an interview with me on a constitutional amendment:

[The Providence Bulletin, November 30, 1931]

ALDRICH TO OFFER NEW PLAN TO CONTROL LIQUOR TRAFFIC—WOULD SUBMIT COMMISSION IDEA TO ALL STATES

WASHINGTON, November 29.—Regulation and control of the liquor traffic by a method never before proposed is provided in a resolution which Representative RICHARD S. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island, will introduce on the opening day of Congress. It calls for submitting to the States a constitutional amendment as an addition to the eighteenth amendment, but on altogether new lines.

Under the amendment the States would be divided into nine groups or districts, from each of which would be elected a commissioner to serve for eight years, the nine commissioners making up a committee that would have authority to license any State making application to manufacture, sell, or transport liquor under such terms and conditions as the State may desire and the commission may prescribe.

Such a commission would be unlike any governmental body in existence in this country. Its members would be elected by popular vote in a form of Federal election not now existing, for all the States in a group would vote for choice of identical candidates, entailing a measure of Federal supervision. The districts would contain as nearly as possible equal populations.

Under the Aldrich plan the provisions of the eighteenth amendment and all laws pertaining to the subject, whether enacted thereunder or not, would remain in effect throughout the United States and its possessions, except when modified by licenses issued by the commission to the several States. After a State had applied for and obtained a license the provisions of the license would become the law of the licensee State in regard to the manufacture, transportation, and sale of all liquors specified in the license. If a State wanted to limit alcoholic beverages to wines and beer, its license could be so worded.

The revenue derived by the Federal Government under this amendment would be obtained from license fees as fixed by the commission and would be paid by the licensed State, not by any individual. In a State which had obtained a license, congressional enactments inconsistent with the provisions of the license would not be operative.

Congress would retain the power to fix the compensation of the commissioners, to impeach and try the commissioners, to judge election returns and qualifications of commissioners, to decide the time and manner of holding the elections, and to appropriate money for the expenses of the commission. Beyond these powers the liquor question would be removed entirely from Congress in the States receiving licenses.

"The chief objects of the amendment which I propose," said Representative ALDRICH to-day, "are:

"1. To modify the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution so that the States electing so to do may adopt a more liberal system, and

"2. To take the liquor question out of Congress, at the same time retaining a Federal supervision over the action of the States in regard to manufacture, transportation, and sale of intoxicating liquors.

"I believe there are numerous reasons why this question should be taken out of Congress. An important one is this: With the growth of the country and continual expanding of the Federal jurisdiction over new matters, the burdens of Members of Congress should be reduced rather than increased, if we expect to maintain a high standard of efficiency in the legislative branch of the Government.

"Another reason may be stated thus: The voter in casting his vote for President or Members of Congress should be able to express preferences on the great economic questions which are confronting the country to-day without having them confused by injection of the prohibition issue into every campaign.

OUT OF HANDS OF CONGRESS

"Thus I propose taking the matter out of the hands of Congress, except in regard to a few matters of detail, and placing Federal supervision in the hands of a commission to be elected by the people.

"In drafting the amendment a great number of technical constitutional questions have arisen. Most of these, I believe, have been solved in a satisfactory manner. A few necessarily have been left for further consideration.

"An attempt has been made, and I think successfully, to meet the specifications of desirable means of regulation set forth in the report of the Wickersham Commission. Control of the traffic is lodged in the Federal license commission, and the initiative is lodged with the States.

"Under this plan it will be possible for the commission to permit a State to adopt the Swedish system, the Norwegian system, the Danish system, or any one of the Canadian systems, with any modifications which the commission may consider desirable. They may try out one system in one State and another system in another, and in that manner obtain valuable information as to the desirability of the various systems, at the same time conserving the benefits of the present situation in those States where conditions are satisfactory."

PROVISIONS FOR ELECTIONS

A provision of the amendment is that Congress, in setting the time for the first election of commissioners, shall arrange it so that they will not be chosen in an election for which electors for President are elected. The plan is to divide the nine chosen at the first election into two classes, one class of five to serve eight years and the other class of four to serve four years, their successors to serve, however, for eight. Thus there would be elections every four years—nonpresidential years—but in different sets of districts.

The nine districts specified in the amendment are arranged in accordance with the 1930 census and with the rules set up in the amendment itself that each district "shall be composed of contiguous and compact territory and such districts shall be as nearly equal in population as shown by the census as practicable." It is provided, however, that all parts of a State shall be in the same district. After each census there shall be a regrouping if necessary to preserve equality in population.

PROPOSED DISTRICTS

The proposed arrangement of the districts to begin with follows:

First (population 8,166,341): Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut.

Second (population 12,588,066): New York.

Third (population 14,397,933): New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware.

Fourth (population 15,116,345): Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, and Tennessee.

Fifth (population 15,411,985): Illinois, Wisconsin, and Michigan.

Sixth (population 15,151,397): Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, and Arkansas.

Seventh (population 15,968,340): Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida.

Eighth (population 14,978,417): Louisiana, Oklahoma, Texas, Alabama, and Mississippi.

Ninth (population 11,896,222): Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Nevada, Washington, Oregon, and California.

In the preparation of his proposed amendment Representative ALDRICH had the assistance of the legislative council of the House of Representatives and of other qualified authorities.

TEXT OF RESOLUTION

The text of the resolution follows: Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution amending the eighteenth amendment.

Resolved, etc., That the following is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States:

"That the eighteenth article of amendment is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"'SEC. 4. (a) There shall be a Federal license commission which shall be composed of nine commissioners who shall have the qualifications of Representatives in Congress and who shall hold their offices during the term of eight years, commencing on the same date as the terms of Representatives. After each census the commission shall divide the States of the United States into nine districts, each of which shall be composed of contiguous and compact territory, and such districts shall be as nearly equal in population as shown by such census as practicable. All parts of a State shall be in the same district. One commissioner shall be elected from each of such districts, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature. A commissioner elected to fill a vacancy shall serve only for the unexpired part of the term of his predecessor.

POWERS OF COMMISSION

"'(b) The commission shall have the sole power:

"'(1) To grant a license to any State applying under authority of law thereof authorizing such State to provide for the manufacture, sale or transportation of any or all intoxicating liquors into, within, or from, the importation thereof from any place outside the jurisdiction of the United States from such State. Licenses shall be granted for terms of 10 years, but the commission may refuse to grant any such license or may grant it subject to such conditions as the commission deems advisable. Each such license shall contain such provisions for the assessment by the commission and payment to it by the State of such fines and penalties as the commission deems necessary to enforce compliance by the State with the terms of the license and shall contain provisions under which the commission shall raise revenue by collecting such fees for the issuance of and operations under the license and by collecting from the State in respect of intoxicating liquors provided for in the license such taxes as the commission deems advisable. All sums received by the commission from fees, fines, penalties, and taxes shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States. The commission may revoke or suspend any license, in whole or in part, for substantial or persistent violation of the terms of the license.

"'(2) To renew or modify any license issued by the commission except that no license shall be renewed or modified except upon application by the State under the authority of law thereof.

"'(3) To make such exemptions from the operation of the law of the United States or of any State as, in the judgment of the commission, are necessary to give effect to any license.

"'(4) To regulate the procedure of the commission, appoint, fix the compensation of, and remove employees of the commission, and provide for all matters relating to the administration of its affairs.

POWERS OF CONGRESS

"'SEC. 5. (a) Congress shall have power to:

"'(1) Provide, by law, for the payment of compensation to the commissioners which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

"'(2) Impeach and try impeachments of commissioners, but the same conditions shall apply thereto as in the case of other officers of the United States.

"'(3) Judge the elections, returns, and qualifications of commissioners.

"'(4) Fix by law the times, places, and manner of holding elections for commissioners.

"'(5) Appropriate by law money out of the Treasury for the expenses of the commission.

"'(b) Neither Congress nor the States shall have power to tax the exportation of any intoxicating liquors from any State to any place outside the jurisdiction of the United States, nor shall any State have power to tax the importation of any intoxicating liquors from any place outside the jurisdiction of the United States, but Congress shall have power to tax intoxicating liquors so imported, but shall not have power to tax any other intoxicating liquors provided for in any license. The commission shall not have power to tax any State in respect of any intoxicating liquors which, under this section, such State can not tax.

"'SEC. 6. Places (not States or parts thereof) subject to the jurisdiction of the United States shall, for the purposes of sections 4 and 5, be considered States except that no such place shall be included for the purpose of establishing districts or electing commissioners therefrom. The legislative authority of any such place, if it has a legislature, shall have the same powers as a State legislative authority in connection with any matter under such sections, but laws enacted in pursuance of such powers shall have no effect if disapproved by Congress. In case such place has no legislature, Congress shall exercise such powers.

ELECTION TIMES TO BE SET

"'SEC. 7. Congress shall fix the time of electing the commissioners first elected so that they will not be elected at an election at which electors for President are elected. Until the commission has established districts, the districts shall be as follows:

"'District No. 1—Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut;

"'District No. 2—New York;

"'District No. 3—New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware;

"'District No. 4—Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, and Tennessee;

"'District No. 5—Illinois, Wisconsin, and Michigan;

"'District No. 6—Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, and Arkansas;

"'District No. 7—Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida;

"'District No. 8—Louisiana, Oklahoma, Texas, Alabama, and Mississippi; and "'District No. 9—Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Nevada, Washington, Oregon, and California.

"'Immediately after the commissioners shall be assembled in consequence of the first election they shall be divided into two classes of five and four, respectively, and the term of those of the smaller class shall expire at the end of the fourth year, but their successors shall hold their office for eight years.'"

THE AMERICAN TRADITION OF HOME RULE

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including an address which I gave over the radio under the auspices of the Sentinels of the Republic upon the subject of home rule in America.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the text of my address, as follows:

The Sentinels of the Republic, under whose auspices I am privileged to speak to-day, are a group of volunteers endeavoring to preserve for our country the American tradition of home rule. Like sentinels in the Army, they stand at the doors of Congress, challenging the legislative proposals that continually seek entry. When they find these proposals at variance with that American tradition, they resist their passage and, if necessary, sound an alarm for aid in arresting them. The mission of the Sentinels of late has become increasingly difficult.

During the World War the Government in Washington assumed emergency command over almost everything, and in the years that have followed the country has been slow in restoring to State and local control many of the activities which in war time were brought under national rule. And now, in the midst of economic depression, our traditional system of local self-government is being subjected to still further strain from a multitude of schemes to widen the sphere of Federal control under the guise of temporary relief, but which are likely to persist long after the emergency has passed. The sentinels to-day face greater obstacles than ever before. Their duties require alert and increasing vigilance. They merit our cooperation and the support of every American who cherishes our institutions and our heritage of freedom.

HISTORICAL BASIS FOR HOME RULE IN AMERICA

The American policy of home rule is the outgrowth of our country's democratic beginnings, but it also has its justification in experience and common sense. Our American system of government differs in its historical evolution from those of European countries with monarchial and military traditions. Unlike the governments of the Old World, ours was not founded upon the theory of the divine right of kings and was not developed through the urge for conquest or the necessity for defense. It was not derived from a highly centralized incarnation of power which had granted limited authority to subordinate agencies. On the contrary, its radiation of power has always flowed from the parts to the center rather than from the center outward.

The elements from which it grew were local town meetings, where all of the people took part. They in turn established joint representation in colonial or State legislatures to carry on the business in which they had a common interest, and eventually, when the various States sought to throw off the yoke of foreign control, these States federated their forces in a combined effort to accomplish that particular purpose. After achieving independence they decided to remain united, but with such limitation and definition of the central government's field of activity as would protect the individual States from Federal encroachments upon their original authority. In order to insure this from too easy chance of change, they adopted a National Constitution, deliberately conveying to the Federal Government control over only such matters as were essentially national and which could not be well looked after by the individual States. The powers assigned to national control included the handling of our foreign relations, the maintenance of the Army and Navy, the control of our monetary system, the administration of the post offices, and the regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, but all powers not specifically delegated to the central Government were expressly reserved to the States or to the people. This was the first system of government in the world in which sovereign powers were so divided, part to be exercised by the central body and part to be exercised locally. For the first time in history a government was created with a clear distribution of functions between the Federal, State, and local members. The Federal Government had power to deal only with international and interstate business. The State governments reserved control over activities that were not of an international or interstate character, while the county and municipal governments, under many of the State constitutions, still remained in charge of matters primarily of local interest. The United States thus began its national history with a larger measure of home rule than any other important country.

There are people to-day inclined to the opinion that with changing conditions, the original allocation of powers as defined in the Federal Constitution and in the constitutions of the several States, has ceased to have much merit and ought to be abandoned. They would turn over to the State governments control over many of the things which have been administered by the towns and cities, and they would revise the Federal Constitution so as to give the National Government free scope to manage almost everything that its legislators and officials might choose to regulate or administer. The Sentinels of the Republic believe, however, that the American system of home rule is not to be regarded as a historic survival which has outlived its day, but that it is fundamentally reasonable and advantageous and ought to be watchfully safeguarded from insidious attack.

HOME RULE ENCOURAGES POPULAR INTEREST IN GOVERNMENT

Only through the preservation of home rule can we hope to maintain popular interest in government, and everyone agrees that democratic government can succeed only in proportion as the people take an active interest and feel a sense of responsibility in its regard. The deepest interest and the liveliest sense of responsibility which the average human being feels center about his family and his home. In order to provide for them, he gives most of his thought and energy and strength. Somewhat less active, but still strong, is his concern for the community in which he lives, its schools, its hospitals, its police, water supply, sewerage, and other public undertakings.

As the circle widens, however, the citizen's sense of participation and obligation continually dwindles in intensity. It diminishes as the distance increases, and as the individual's power to affect results decreases. In his town or ward his influence is perhaps measured by 1 vote in several thousand; in his State he may have only 1 vote in a million; in the Nation barely 1 in 40,000,000. He follows the doings of his municipal council rather closely. He knows less about the transactions of the State legislature, and as for the daily grist of legislation in Washington he knows virtually nothing, except when occasional measures, frequently by no means the most important, get into the headlines.

It follows then that the more you transfer of control to a distant center like the Capital in Washington, the more negligent people become of their duties as citizens, the less informed and careful they are about the character of the laws that are being adopted, and the less concerned with their efficient administration. Government, especially in a country as vast as ours, runs the risk of becoming more and more a system of control imposed from the remote outside in which the average citizen feels that he has little influence and slight incentive to take part. But conversely, the more you preserve of home rule and local control in public affairs the more you keep alive a general interest in government, in the efficiency of the officials selected, in the type of legislation being enacted, and in the administration and observance of the laws.

This advantage of home rule has been all too often overlooked by well-intentioned people who try to have our National Government take charge of a thousand and one matters that lie close to our individual lives, and that have hitherto been looked after by State or local governmental agencies.

HOME RULE PROMOTES ECONOMY IN GOVERNMENT

Then, again, it is only through the preservation of home rule that one can look for economy in government. In extending the activities of the Federal Government the tendency often is to develop a Federal administration running parallel to those already operating in the States. This results in two sets of laws governing the same subjects, though not always conforming one with the other. It creates two sets of bureaus, Federal and State, doing much the same things, with a twofold machinery for their management and enforcement. It doubles the necessary personnel and expense. With the augmentation of Federal authority in recent decades, the number of Federal officeholders has continually multiplied, while the State personnel has increased at the same time. During the past 50 years the number of people on the Federal pay rolls has grown about four times as rapidly as the population, and the cost of the purely civil establishment (leaving out of account the Army and Navy, the enormous expenditures on behalf of veterans, and the payments on the public debt) is to-day nearly five times as much for every man, woman, and child in the country as it was 50 years ago. Yet during the same period the per capita expenditures of the States have likewise been steadily mounting, and State employees have also increased in number much more rapidly than the population. The cost of government in the United States to-day is close to an eighth of our estimated national income. It was a tenth not long ago, and not long before that it was a twelfth. What are we headed for, and whither is it all tending, except toward an impossibly expensive and overgovernmentalized nation, composed in the main of Federal and State officials and their agents and employees?

So long as the business of government is kept under the watchful eyes of those who bear its cost, there is a natural check upon overlapping and duplicating expenditures, but when spending bodies are established far from the tax-paying public, this brake upon needless expense ceases to function. The Federal Government can spend ten millions here or fifty millions there, or a hundred millions somewhere else, without eliciting any critical scrutiny from the average citizen, or any perception of the fact that this expenditure may be in large part a superfluous duplication by the Government in Washington of expenditures for a similar purpose on the part of the several States. It is, therefore, a dictate of prudence to challenge and examine carefully every proposal to extend Federal activity in fields that have belonged to the States.

HOME RULE PRESERVES RESPECT FOR GOVERNMENT

There is a widely current illusion that the Federal Government is more effective in the exercise of its powers than are the governments of the States. Many people seem to think that there is something almost magical about the Government in Washington, that if State and local laws are inadequate, Washington can frame laws upon every conceivable subject that are perfect, that if State and local bureaus and officials are incompetent, Washington bureaus and appointees will be efficient and full of energy, that if State and local laws are not enforced, all that need be done is to pass laws in Washington, and these laws will be everywhere observed and respected. Yet, after all, the people in Washington also have their human limitations. They are not omniscient, nor are they omnipotent. Their days are also limited to 24 hours. It is a good deal to expect of them to frame appropriate laws to govern every activity of people's lives, everything that people buy and sell, everything that they use or abuse, everything that they enjoy, everything that they may choose to do. And it is still more presumptuous to assume that the bureaus in Washington and their agents throughout the country can enforce these laws in all localities, regardless of whether or not the preponderant opinion of the citizens approves of them.

Federal laws, according to the Constitution, must apply uniformly throughout the length and breadth of the land. They allow of no adjustment to local interests and no adaptation to local opinions. On that account many well-meaning people think that they are preferable to State laws and offer a quicker and easier method of getting rid of what they consider local abuses and deficiencies in legislation. But unless these laws appeal to the judgment and conscience of good citizens in all sections of the country the attempt to coerce uniformity by resort to the central government can not but breed local dissension and weaken respect for that government's authority. In a country as vast as our own, and with as wide diversities of local customs, opinions, and interests, by adopting one rigid and inflexible Federal measure after another, the tendency is to remove the Federal Government further and further from the people; to make it less and less responsive to their will and more and more the object of their animosity.

The men and women who settled the Thirteen Colonies came to America to escape the oppression of strongly centralized governments in which they had no voice. The people of our day can not emigrate to another world, but unless the essential principles of government by the consent of the governed can be maintained here the time may come when they will seek some other way to reestablish home rule.

ELECTION OF COMMITTEES

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolution offered by Mr. RAINEY:

House Resolution 61

Resolved, That the following Members be, and they are hereby, elected members of the following standing committees of the House of Representatives, to wit:

Accounts: William J. Driver, Arkansas; Samuel Rutherford, Georgia; John W. Boehne, jr., Indiana.

Agriculture: Marvin Jones, Texas (chairman); Hampton P. Fulmer, South Carolina; William W. Larsen, Georgia; William L. Nelson, Missouri; Wall Doxey, Mississippi; D. D. Glover, Arkansas; John N. Norton, Nebraska; John R. Mitchell, Tennessee; Cap R. Carden, Kentucky; John W. Flannagan, jr., Virginia; Harry P. Beam, Illinois; James G. Polk, Ohio; Richard M. Kleberg, Texas.

Banking and Currency: Henry B. Steagall, Alabama (chairman); Charles H. Brand, Georgia; William F. Stevenson, South Carolina; T. Alan Goldsborough, Maryland; Anning S. Prall, New York; Jeff Busby, Mississippi; Michael K. Reilly, Wisconsin; Frank Hancock, North Carolina; Clyde Williams, Missouri; Percy H. Stewart, New Jersey; Wesley E. Disney, Oklahoma; William L. Tierney, Connecticut.

Census: Ralph F. Lozier, Missouri (chairman); John E. Rankin, Mississippi; René L. DeRouen, Louisiana; O. H. Cross, Texas; John H. Kerr, North Carolina; Andrew L. Somers, New York; Thomas A. Yon, Florida; Ralph Gilbert, Kentucky; William H. Larrabee, Indiana; Bernhard M. Jacobsen, Iowa; William L. Fiesinger, Ohio; Lynn S. Hornor, West Virginia.

Civil Service: Lamar Jeffers, Alabama (chairman); William I. Sirovich, New York; Claude A. Fuller, Arkansas; Robert Ramspeck, Georgia; John J. Douglass, Massachusetts; René L. DeRouen, Louisiana; Wright Patman, Texas; James F. Fulbright, Missouri; John W. Boehne, jr., Indiana; Howard W. Smith, Virginia; Brent Spence, Kentucky.

Claims: Loring M. Black, jr., New York (chairman); J. Bayard Clark, North Carolina; Robert Ramspeck, Georgia; Samuel Dickstein, New York; Ralph F. Lozier, Missouri; Fletcher B. Swank, Oklahoma; John E. Miller, Arkansas; Howard W. Smith, Virginia; John W. Boehne, jr., Indiana; Byron B. Harlan, Ohio.

Coinage, Weights, and Measures: Andrew L. Somers, New York (chairman); Edgar Howard, Nebraska; John J. Douglass, Massachusetts; Bolivar E. Kemp, Louisiana; Robert A. Green, Florida; Vincent L. Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, before the question is put I ask unanimous consent to drop the name of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KINZER] from the Committee on Claims, as that is an error.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

FISCAL RELATIONS BETWEEN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA AND THE UNITED STATES

Mr. MAPES, chairman of the Select Committee of the House on Fiscal Relations between the District of Columbia and the United States, submitted a report (Report No. 1), which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Union Calendar and ordered printed.

TAXATION OF INCOMES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. MAPES, chairman of the Select Committee on Fiscal Relations Between the District of Columbia and the United States, submitted a bill (H. R. 5821) to provide for the taxation of incomes in the District of Columbia, to repeal certain provisions of law relating to the taxation of intangible personal property in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, together with a report (Report No. 2) upon the bill, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire whether the bill which was just submitted by the select committee is privileged.

The SPEAKER. The bill is privileged under a resolution passed by the last Congress. Section 4 of House Resolution 285, passed by the Seventy-first Congress, reads as follows:

The committee shall have the right to report to the House at any time by a bill or bills, or otherwise, the results of its investigations.

The authority of this resolution was later extended by the act of February 23, 1931 (46 Stat. 1377).

ESTATE TAX FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I have been directed by the committee to report a bill providing an estate tax for the District of Columbia, and I am accompanying it with a report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin presents a bill and report, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to provide for an estate tax for the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

GASOLINE AND MOTOR-VEHICLE-WEIGHT TAX IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make the further announcement at this time that later in the day or to-morrow the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] will report from the same committee a bill to increase the gasoline tax in the District of Columbia from 2 cents to 4 cents, and another bill providing for a motor-vehicle-weight tax in the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, in that connection I wish to ask unanimous consent that I have until 6 o'clock to-day to file those bills, if they are then ready—which I think they will be—together with the reports.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that he have the balance of this legislative day in which to file with the Clerk two bills from the select committee and that the bills be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, some of the members of the committee would like an opportunity to refer briefly to the work of the committee and the report it has just submitted. I ask unanimous consent that I may be granted the control of one hour, a part of which I shall yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], a part to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS], and perhaps a part to some other members of the committee, for the purpose of commenting upon and calling attention to the report which the committee has just filed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to address the House for one hour, with the privilege of yielding time to certain Members. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, this is some of the most important work, in my judgment, that has been done in Congress for 10 years. Why does not the gentleman ask for two hours' time, an hour to be controlled by himself and the other hour to be parceled out.

Mr. MAPES. I will state to the gentleman from Texas that the committee has just submitted its report. The report has not yet been printed and is therefore not available to the membership of the House, but the members of the committee thought they would like this brief time in which to direct the attention of the Members to the report; and if the Members desire to discuss it more fully at some other time, after the report has been printed and is available, all right and good; but for the present the members of the committee thought that one hour would be sufficient.

Mr. BLANTON. Then the gentleman intends to ask for adequate time for debate on these bills?

Mr. MAPES. We hope to consider some of the bills to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it will be necessary to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of these bills. Under that condition there will be such general debate as the committee may desire. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for one hour.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, before calling attention to the report which has just been submitted, I want to express my appreciation to the members of this committee for the work they have done. The committee consisted of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BEERS], the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS], the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], and myself. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] were members in the last Congress of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations having in charge the District appropriation bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BEERS] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] were members of the District legislative committee, so that the members of the committee had some familiarity with District legislation before they were appointed to this committee.

It is probably unnecessary for me to say that no member of the committee sought this assignment; in fact, I think it safe to say that every member accepted the assignment with reluctance. I want to say that the members of the committee accepted the duty assigned them, however, and performed it with the utmost care, faithfulness, industry, and ability. Their work was performed in a spirit of the utmost harmony and friendliness. The committee submits its report this afternoon for whatever it may be worth to the membership of the House.

In this connection I perhaps may say now as well as at any time that the committee, after its organization and after holding public hearings, retained Mr. George Lord, of Detroit, Mich., a tax expert, for research work; and I think it is the unanimous opinion of the committee that his services have been invaluable to the committee. He has been devoting himself to tax work exclusively for a period of something over 20 years, and the committee could not have conducted the investigation it has without his assistance and advice.

Mr. Speaker, under the resolution, it was the duty of the committee to report back to the House the amount that, in its judgment, it thought fair and just for the Federal Government to contribute toward the expenses of the District government. We are doing that in this report.

It was also made the duty of the committee to investigate other sources of revenue within the District, and the committee was given the right to report its findings and recommendations by bill or otherwise as it saw fit. The committee is submitting a report of something over 60 pages in length and four bills which it will ask to be considered and passed later on—one an income tax bill for the District, one an inheritance tax bill, one a bill increasing the tax on gasoline from 2 to 4 cents a gallon, and a motor-vehicle-weight tax bill.

In the judgment of the committee, these taxes are paid by most of the people of the United States, and the committee thinks there is no reason why they should not be paid by the people within the District of Columbia.

Anyone who makes any serious study of the fiscal relations between the District and the Federal Government will find that from time to time, beginning soon after the removal of the Capital to its present location, joint committees or select committees of one kind or another have been appointed to investigate and to report back their findings in regard to the general subject of the relationship of the District of Columbia to the Federal Government. This committee considered it unwise to rehash or to go over the same subject matter which has been gone over so many times, periodically, during the last 100 years.

The committee felt there was one phase of the subject matter, however, that had not been thoroughly and exhaustively studied, and it set about to make a study of that one particular feature.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. The same power and authority that authorizes the committee to bring in these four matters of legislation—the income tax, the inheritance tax, the gas tax, and the motor-vehicle tax, all of which are good and all of which I most heartily approve—gives this committee the power and authority to suggest legislation carrying out the main recommendation which they were appointed to make; and I was hopeful the committee would bring in that recommendation in the form of a bill and pass it and get that matter out of the way, so it will not harass Congress for the next 20 years. If we leave it to some other committee and do not clinch the nail now after we drive it through, my idea is that we are going to leave it in indefinite shape for the next 10 years, to bother us and hamstring us——

Mr. MAPES. I think I understand the gentleman's point.

Mr. BLANTON. And hold us up again in the last hours of Congress, as we were held up before we adjourned last March.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, whether it would be advisable for Congress to fix by law a definite amount of annual contribution, I think, perhaps, is open to question; but whether it is advisable to do so or not is, of course, a matter of policy. I do not think that the determination of that question of public policy was submitted to this committee. I do not think that that was within the province of this committee. I do not think the resolution creating the committee either contemplated or authorized the committee to bring in such a piece of legislation as the gentleman from Texas suggests. The resolution reads that the committee "is authorized" to recommend to the House what amount, in their judgment, the United States should contribute annually toward the development and maintenance of the municipality.

It has never been considered by the committee that it was the duty of the committee to bring in a bill to carry out that particular feature of its recommendation.

As I was saying, the committee felt that there was one subject which had not been thoroughly discussed or investigated by former committees, and this committee set about to make a study of that particular subject, namely, what is the tax burden of the people of the District of Columbia as compared with people in comparable cities, so-called cities of about the same size and advantages. It was for the purpose of making that study that the committee secured the assistance of Mr. Lord, the tax expert to whom I have referred.

Mr. Lord got in touch with the municipal officers, the real-estate boards, the chambers of commerce, and others familiar with valuations in the respective cities of the country comparable in size, and worked out and adjusted the rates for the people in the District of Columbia as compared with the other 22 cities with which comparison was made.

With the report filed by the committee, the committee is filing this table, along with other tables, as an annex or appendix to its report. These tables, the committee feels, are almost invaluable.

In this adjusted tax-rate table the committee finds that the tax per thousand in the District of Columbia is $15.30. The lowest rate outside of the District is in Kansas City, where it is $17.58. The rate varies from that up to the rate in the city of Louisville, where it is over $30—$30.80 to be exact—or twice as high as it is in the District of Columbia.

Mr. DYER. Will it interfere with the gentleman if I ask him a question?

Mr. MAPES. Not at all.

Mr. DYER. How much additional tax on the people, under the recommendation of the committee, as to the Federal contribution, would it require in raising the taxes in the District of Columbia to meet the full expenses of the District government?

Mr. MAPES. I intend to get to that a little later.

Mr. DYER. Very well.

Mr. CANNON. In the event that the House should not pass the four bills to which the gentleman refers, what would be the alternative?

Mr. MAPES. The alternative would be an increase in the general property tax in the District.

Mr. CANNON. And, approximately, what rate?

Mr. MAPES. I think 20 cents a hundred would take care of it.

Congress in the fixing of the tax rate for the District of Columbia, or in passing the annual appropriation bill for the District must act in a dual capacity. It must represent the District, and it must represent the people of the United States outside of the District, and, of course, wants to be fair to both. It has the dual obligation to perform as it passes the annual District appropriation bill. The committee, as the report indicates, finds that the people of the country are laboring under a very heavy tax burden; in many cases it is heavier than the taxpayer can bear.

The amount of property sold for delinquent taxes in the last few years the country over is something appalling. The committee says in its report that it does not want to make a recommendation that will result in making the tax burden in the District of Columbia to rest as heavily upon the people of the District as it rests upon the people outside of the District, because the committee is impressed with the fact that the tax burden on the people outside the District generally is too high.

At the same time, it is difficult to argue that the people outside, with this heavy burden, should contribute to the expenses of the District government as long as the people of the District do not pay as large a tax as the average paid in comparable cities.

The report goes at length into the discussion of this subject of what is the proper rule to follow in order to determine how much the people of the District should pay toward the expenses of the District government. There was very little disagreement among the witnesses that appeared before the committee, if there was any—I do not recall any disagreement on the part of witnesses who reside in the District of Columbia as to the proper rule to follow.

As I have said, several committees have investigated the subject and have expressed their opinion as to the rule that should be followed. Most of them frankly say that they think that the people in the District should be required to pay in taxes about the same as the people have to pay who live in comparable cities; that is, cities of practically the same size and advantages. Some of the witnesses from the District, however, were tenacious in their contention that they are already doing that. The committee adopted that rule and have tried to find out what people in other comparable cities pay.

One of the duties of the joint committee of 1915 was to prepare and submit a statement of the proper proportions of the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, or any branch thereof, which shall be borne by said District and the United States, respectively. It will be seen that that committee had practically the same question to determine, as far as laying down the rule is concerned, as was submitted to this committee. The joint committee in 1915 said:

> We find after a most careful consideration of all the evidence and circumstances as shown to exist at this time that there is no reason for any arbitrary rule of proportionate contribution of expenses by the District of Columbia, by the residents thereof, and by the people of the United States who reside outside of the District; that the correct rule should be that the responsibility in taxation of the residents of the District of Columbia be as fixed and certain as the responsibility of residents of other American cities comparable with the city of Washington; that with the payment of such taxes, as may be equitable and properly assessed against privately owned taxable property, the financial responsibility of the residents of the District of Columbia should be concluded.

And the joint committee of 1922, of which the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HARDY] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WRIGHT] were members, considered this fiscal relations question in some of its aspects, and made a report in which it said some of the members of the committee believed that the United States has for a long time, and is now, contributing more than its just proportion of the administration of the District of Columbia and the upkeep of the District.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. BOWMAN. I understand the report fixes the amount due the District of Columbia from the Federal Government at $6,500,000. Is that correct?

Mr. MAPES. The report says that in the judgment of the committee the Federal contribution annually should not exceed $6,500,000.

Mr. BOWMAN. Can the gentleman inform the House how the committee arrived at that conclusion?

Mr. MAPES. Yes; I shall be glad to, and I shall come to that in a moment.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. COX. In the action of the committee in making recommendations to increase the tax burden of the people of the District of Columbia had the committee in mind the raising of larger funds from the District in order to meet increased District expenditures, or was it for the purpose of lowering the Federal contribution?

Mr. MAPES. The committee took all of those questions into consideration.

Mr. COX. Then what particular purpose, in the recommendations of the committee, did the committee desire to serve—making possible an increase in District expenditures or the lowering of the Federal contributions?

Mr. MAPES. I do not know that I clearly understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. COX. In the committee's recommendation in the interest of equalizing the tax burdens of the people of the District with the tax burdens of the people outside of the District they have recommended a raise in taxes for the people of the District, which, of course, will necessarily mean an increase in the tax revenues. Did the gentleman's committee desire to increase the revenue in order to enable larger District expenditures or did the committee desire to increase the revenue, as the gentleman has said, in the interest of equalizing the tax burden of the people of the District with the other people of the country in order to accommodate the desire, if not the demand, for a lowering of the Federal contribution?

Mr. MAPES. In following the rule which I have already referred to, that the tax burden in the District ought to be somewhat comparable to the tax burden in other cities of the same size and advantages, the committee felt that inasmuch as these taxes, which will be required if the bills which the committee has recommended are enacted, are paid by the people in these comparable cities, that on any comparative basis the people of the District ought to pay them, and after they were paid and after the people pay other taxes somewhat comparable to what people in other cities pay, then the Government should contribute whatever is necessary and proper to maintain the District government.

Mr. COX. The gentleman's committee has not recommended a tax levy on the people of the District which comes up to an average of the burden levied in the cities of this country, has it? They are still below the average of all the comparable cities of the country which the study conducted by the committee took into consideration.

Mr. MAPES. As the report says, it was not the province of the committee to fix a rate on general property. The rate is fixed more or less automatically after the Federal contribution is fixed. The rate is whatever is necessary over and above $1.70 per $100 to raise the budget; but answering the substance of the gentleman's question, the committee has not in its report made a recommendation which in the judgment of the committee will bring the tax rate of the people of the District up to the average of what it is in comparable cities.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. GLOVER. As I understand the recommendation of the committee it reduces the amount about two and a half or three million dollars below what it was in the last appropriation.

Mr. MAPES. I shall come to that in a moment.

Mr. GLOVER. Did the committee take into consideration in arriving at this figure the fact that much of the property that has heretofore borne a revenue to the city had been taken over by the Government for Government buildings, and that that would reduce the revenues somewhat or at least to the amount of the tax that was paid on that property?

Mr. MAPES. The committee did not reach the conclusion which the gentleman's question implies. The city assessor says that the values of privately owned property increased more than enough to make up the difference due to the loss of property which the Government takes over.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. MAPES. I want to finish my statement. I yield for a question.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that if the gentleman's recommendations are all approved by Congress, the people of the District of Columbia yet will pay only $1.70 on the hundred?

Mr. MAPES. That is true.

Now, I should like to make a general statement, perhaps repeating something I have already said. It is the judgment of the majority of the committee that the general property tax, the country over, is too high and too burdensome, and one of the purposes of the committee in reporting the bills which it has reported is to relieve the general property tax by the income tax, the inheritance tax, and the other taxes mentioned, in so far as they will relieve them in the District of Columbia. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. MAPES. If it is brief.

Mr. COX. The gentleman makes the observation that the tax burden of the people generally throughout the country is entirely too high. Is the gentleman not willing to concede that the conditions in the country are such that it is impossible for the States and other communities to lower the tax burden at this time, and that therefore, if there is to be anything of an equalization of the burdens, the recommendation of the committee ought to go to the extent of recommending a considerably higher levy on the people of the District, the gentleman recognizing, of course, that in this regard Congress has no control over the rest of the country?

Mr. MAPES. I prefer the gentleman would not make a speech. The committee desires to confine itself to the District of Columbia and not to assume the responsibility of lowering taxes in the States and in other communities. It has enough work to do if it confines itself to the District of Columbia.

I should say, perhaps, that the report of the committee is signed by six of the seven members of the committee, and that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] submits additional views. My understanding of the position of the gentleman from Wisconsin, briefly, is that he agrees with the committee in its findings of facts, but he would go farther than the committee has gone in its conclusions; he would go to the extent of requiring the people in the District to pay a general property tax equivalent to the average tax, at least of that in comparable cities, before asking the Federal Government to contribute anything. The majority of the committee, because of the peculiar set-up which makes the Congress the absolute authority over the District, as the committee report says, if it is going to err, prefers to make the error on the side of liberality; and in view of the further fact that it considers that the average general property tax the country over is too high and too burdensome, and in many cases prohibitive, it hesitates to make a recommendation, the effect of which will be to bring the general property tax in the District of Columbia up to the average even of the general property tax in the comparable cities.

Mr. COX. May I make one further observation?

Mr. MAPES. I can not yield further. Permit me to say that, in addition to the four bills which the committee has reported, the committee recommends a change in the law relating to the taxation of the property of steam railroads in the District. In investigating this subject the committee found that about one-half of the property of the steam railroads in the District of Columbia is exempt from taxation, according to the District assessor. The law says that the viaducts, tunnels, retaining walls, and some other things relating to steam railroad property are exempt entirely from taxation. The committee recommends that this subject be looked into by the legislative Committee on the District of Columbia and that that law be changed. It also recommends a change in the tax law with reference to taxing public utilities within the District; and if those changes are made, in addition to the four bills reported by the committee, material increases in the revenues will be provided.

The four bills which the committee has recommended the committee thinks are just and equitable and should be passed for the purpose of relieving the general property tax to that extent, and there can be no argument against them certainly when considered from the standpoint of comparative tax burdens. If those bills are passed, the committee estimates that the revenues of the District of Columbia will be increased a trifle over $4,000,000 per year.

Some one has asked "What will happen if these bills are not passed." In the District budget submitted to Congress during the last few days the estimates provide for a nearly balanced budget on the basis of the annual contribution from the Federal Government of nine and one-half million dollars. The committee says that if these four bills are passed, so far as the next fiscal year is concerned, the annual contribution of Congress could be reduced to $5,500,000, but it feels that on account of the economic conditions the District Commissioners and others have perhaps reduced their estimates and their requests to a lower figure than it would be safe for Congress to depend upon as a permanent policy, and it is therefore recommended that the annual appropriation of Congress be not to exceed $6,500,000. The committee thinks that that amount, together with the constantly increasing valuations of privately owned property within the District, together with these bills which the committee has reported and other legislation which the committee thinks should be passed, will take care of the reasonable increases in the cost of the District government for years to come, and that the margin between the present rate of taxation in the District on general property of $17 per thousand and the average rate of the comparable cities will more than take care of any emergency or any unusual expansion of the activities of the Government in the District. The report would place the burden of this additional increase upon the people of the District of Columbia themselves, where the committee thinks it belongs.

The committee says frankly that if the bills reported by it are not passed, requiring the people of the District to pay taxes that people in other cities are required to pay, then in its judgment the general property tax should be increased to take care of whatever is necessary to run the government in the District over and above the annual contribution of the Federal Government of $6,500,000.

Mr. Speaker, I have taken more time than I expected. I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, the chairman of the committee has pretty well covered the report. As suggested by him, I am sure that no member of this committee desired this assignment. I know I sought to be relieved, but it was insisted by those in authority that it was an important matter which some of us should investigate. The members of the committee, I am sure, have all contributed their very best efforts. We have labored long, diligently, and conscientiously in an effort to arrive at proper conclusions with respect to this troublesome question and have made a report and recommendations which we think are in keeping with the facts and the justice of the case.

The question of the fiscal relations between the Federal Government and the District of Columbia, and the relative proportions which each should pay, has always been a controversial question, as you older Members are fully aware.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the report of this committee end that controversy?

Mr. DAVIS. I will state to the gentleman from West Virginia that we can not speak as to that. We can make no prediction, but we certainly hope that it may have that effect.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. BOWMAN. The gentleman will recall that when this special committee was appointed it was appointed because of the controversy over the fiscal relations between the Federal Government and the District of Columbia. Your committee brings in recommendations for new legislation which are probably all right, but it only makes a recommendation as to the amount that must be paid or should be paid by the Federal Government to the District of Columbia. Does not the gentleman believe it should have brought in legislation which would fix definitely the fiscal relations between the Federal Government and the District of Columbia? As it is now, we shall continue to have this controversy in every session of Congress.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, I will state to the gentleman that the committee thinks that it has acted in accordance with the instructions given it in the resolution which created the committee, and we have made our recommendation as to the amount which we think is a fair contribution as long as the fundamental conditions remain as they are now. We have recommended, and either have or will introduce, several bills in accordance with the instructions in the first section of the resolution, providing for additional revenue to be raised in the District of Columbia.

Of course the purpose of the creation of this committee was to endeavor to settle this question, at least for a time. We believe that if the membership of the House will carefully read this report and all of the data that are filed with the report and then will hear the debate upon the respective bills as they are taken up for action, they will reach the same conclusions, generally speaking, as this committee has reached.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DAVIS. I will yield once more. My time is limited.

Mr. BOWMAN. I want the gentleman to understand that I am not criticizing the committee nor its report, but I am criticizing the committee because it has not attempted to establish a definite policy for fixing the fiscal relations.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, the committee thinks it has. It has made these definite recommendations. Whether the Congress will accept them or not, of course, we can not now tell. That is a matter to be determined. I think the report and recommendations are as specific as are the directions to the committee.

Now, as I was stating, this has always been a controversial subject. There has never been any uniformity or consistency and, perhaps during the greater part of the time, no logic determining the relative proportion of the payments to the expenses of the District of Columbia. For many, many years the Federal Government contributed 50 per cent to the expenses of the District of Columbia; then for a number of years it contributed 40 per cent; then for a number of years it contributed a lump sum of $9,000,000 per annum, and during the present fiscal year we have appropriated $9,500,000. All of those sums were perhaps arbitrarily arrived at and, of course, any sum that may be fixed is perhaps more or less arbitrary. But this committee has thoroughly investigated the subject from every angle. We have undertaken to arrive at a proper basis by comparison with the tax burdens of 22 comparable cities; and we have taken into consideration other features, in fact, every feature which we thought should be taken into consideration.

The committee reached a unanimous agreement except that the gentleman from Wisconsin has filed some additional views, and, of course, he will state his position on the floor. Briefly, he takes the position—which has already been argued to a certain extent in the debate—that we should raise the real property tax of the District of Columbia comparable to that of other cities of like jurisdiction. However, a majority of the members of this committee feel that, as stated by the chairman of the committee, taxes have mounted and mounted throughout the country until they have become burdensome everywhere; that there should be retrenchment and doubtless will be retrenchment throughout the country, and that we, as the legislative guardians of the District of Columbia, should set an example of retrenchment and economy along that line rather than to follow in the wake of increases in taxation and the extravagance in government with which the whole country, perhaps, has been afflicted in large measure for the past many years.

It is a matter of pride to the members of this committee, and I presume to every Member of the House, that this is the only city of comparable size—and, so far as I know, the only city of any size in this country—which does not have a bonded indebtedness. As the burden and responsibility rests upon Congress to provide for the government of the District of Columbia, we think that this city should not only be made the most beautiful and most attractive city in the world as our National Capital but in so far as we may that we should make it a model city in government and in taxation.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. DAVIS. As we state in our report, if we have erred, we have perhaps erred on the side of liberality, if we take into consideration the present tax structure in other cities of comparable size; but I think it has always been the disposition of Congress to be generous toward the District of Columbia because of the very great and vital interest the Government and the people of the United States have in our National Capital; and this fact has been manifest during all the past by the fact that the Government first contributed half of the expenses and then 40 per cent, and at least in modern times has never contributed as small an amount as we are now recommending.

Mr. KERR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. KERR. What is the value of the Government property in the city of Washington which is nontaxable?

Mr. DAVIS. Some of the witnesses who appeared before our committee stated their estimate of that; in fact, I think the city tax assessor fixed a value of $320,000,000 of Government property in the District of Columbia, and in that respect it is insisted by at least some of the citizens of the District of Columbia that we should pay a tax or make a contribution by reason of the large investment here in Federal property. But our reply to this is that this property is no burden to the District of Columbia. It, together with the Federal activities, constitutes the chief and almost the sole asset of this city, and because of these buildings and because of the Federal activities there is constantly a large flow of visitors to the National Capital who spend their money here, not to speak of the very large population of Government employees who are here all the time and spend their money in the city of Washington.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman permit an interruption at that point?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. COX. I have always been trying to find justification for imposing the burden upon all the people of the country of contributing to the support of the District of Columbia. The gentleman, I am sure, is prepared to give the committee's reason for recommending a continuation of that state of affairs.

Mr. DAVIS. I will state to the gentleman from Georgia we thought that the Federal Government, in theory, should contribute the difference, if any, between the expenses of the District of Columbia as fixed by Congress, that is the appropriations, and the amount of taxes that would be raised in the District of Columbia when they were taxed a reasonable amount and one comparable with the amount in other comparable cities. If we should now raise the present tax on property in the District of Columbia to the average of other comparable cities, this would make it unnecessary, according to present appropriations, for the Federal Government to contribute anything.

We have undertaken to make a report that will be valuable and will be a guide to the Congress not merely for the coming fiscal year, but for a number of years to come.

There is one further feature in this connection——

Mr. MAPES. I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. DAVIS. There is one other feature that the committee took into consideration, necessarily, which has not been mentioned so far as I have heard, and that is that in times past there was quite an accumulation of District of Columbia surplus funds and we have been gradually encroaching upon those funds from year to year until they are now practically exhausted, and we will not have that source hereafter to draw upon.

Mr. COX. When the gentleman permitted an interruption I really intended asking the gentleman this question: The gentleman speaks of his committee setting an example to the country. Since the gentleman's committee interpreted the charge given it by the Congress in the setting up of the committee as imposing the obligation to study and recommend legislation looking toward equalizing the tax burden as between the people of the District and the people of the outlying country, and since the gentleman recognizes that the conditions that are now existing in the States and in other divisions of Government are such as can not be reached by any action that Congress can take, does not the gentleman agree that maybe the committee would have been better serving the charge given it by the Congress if it had recommended a tax burden on the people of the District that more nearly equalized that burden with the burden of the people of the country?

Mr. DAVIS. It is a matter of opinion as to whether the committee should have recommended and reported a bill increasing the tax rate on real property in the District of Columbia. We have fully reported the facts, and any Member of Congress who desires to do so is at full liberty to introduce such a bill. The real-property tax is being abolished or substantially reduced in many jurisdictions, and other forms of taxation are taking the place thereof. We submit that if the recommendation of this committee shall be adopted and the bills for raising additional revenue in the District of Columbia which we have introduced and will introduce shall be enacted into law, it would result in very substantially reducing the contribution by the Federal Government. The present annual appropriations for the District of Columbia are approximately $45,000,000. If the bills which we recommend should be enacted into law, it would not be necessary for the United States to pay over $6,500,000 of this sum. We recommend that the Federal appropriation not exceed this amount. That is certainly a very considerable saving to the Federal Government when we take into consideration the fact that for a long period of time the Federal Government contributed one-half of all the District of Columbia expenses, and then 40 per cent, and then amounts ranging from $9,000,000 to $9,700,000 per annum, the contribution during the present fiscal year being $9,500,000. The citizens, organizations, and newspapers of the District of Columbia insist that the Federal Government should contribute toward the maintenance of the District of Columbia a much larger sum than that now being contributed, not to speak of a much smaller sum which our committee recommends. You will also find that many—I hope not too many—Members at the other end of the Capitol entertain this same attitude. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, the interruptions have caused the committee to take more time than was anticipated. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the time allotted to the committee be extended one-half hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. McMILLAN). The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the time heretofore allotted be extended 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will that be all the time the gentleman will ask? Will the gentleman conclude in that time?

Mr. FREAR. If the gentleman will permit, I do not know whether it will be all the time required or not. This question is rather important.

Mr. GREENWOOD. There have been many who have asked for time under general debate, and they are here, ready to speak; and in the absence of the floor leader I would not like to consent to more than the 30 minutes requested, because there has been an allotment of time under general debate.

Mr. MAPES. I may say, Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] one-half hour to discuss his additional views, and we will try to get through in that length of time.

Mr. GREENWOOD. It seems to me that in view of the fact that the gentleman fixed the time in the beginning, he should have taken that into consideration. I shall not object to the 30 minutes, but I shall object to any further extension of time.

Mr. MAPES. I will say to the gentleman that when we fixed the time originally we did not think that the Members of the House would interrogate us as much as they have.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I do not know of any time in my experience here when a committee of the ability and high character of this fiscal affairs committee has disappointed in the results, and brought on the questioning which has occurred here to-day.

I am not going to discuss the general proposition of District affairs to-day, because the bills come up to-morrow, but I do wish to read a portion of my minority report, which contains practically the argument that answers some of the questions asked here to-day.

It has been stated, "Is this beautiful city going to be handicapped?" Why, no. No one advocates that. There is only just one question to consider, and that is, Shall the District pay its fair share of the taxes? The question has been suggested that the people are paying a greater tax in other parts of the country. Surely that is true, and those people are contributing to the $9,500,000 that makes it easy for the people here to pay so little.

I wish to read briefly from this minority statement, and I think it answers the questions you have been asking and now have in mind. If it does not, I shall be glad to answer any questions if I can get sufficient time to do so.

Mr. BLANTON. Will not the gentleman ask unanimous consent to put the entire statement in the RECORD?

Mr. FREAR. Yes. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, the minority report I have filed with the committee is based upon the following facts:

The committee has found that whereas the District of Columbia is now receiving a contribution or subsidy from the Federal Government of $9,500,000 annually, that compared with 22 other cities of nearest population and character, the District, which means the city of Washington, should pay in taxes and license fees approximately $14,000,000 or more annually to equal the average amount collected in these 22 cities. That is the committee finding.

After many months' examination, investigation, and deliberation the committee has reported that it recommends a raise in gas taxes, automobile taxes, and presents an estate tax and income tax. These total $4,100,000 annually, according to estimates, but it should be noted that the estate tax is returned or credited by the Federal Government to the extent of 80 per cent, so that should be deducted from any increased burden to District taxpayers.

The income tax is offered as a substitute for the intangible-property tax, and that, too, is a substitute rather than an increased tax. The real-estate and personal-property tax, which estimated together would reach $9,298,500, to be placed on a par with the average tax payments of the 22 cities, is ignored by the committee and is by far the largest item, reaching practically the $9,500,000 annually paid as a District subsidy by the Federal Government in 1931. If this one item of taxes paid by other cities is collected, it would relieve the necessity for any Federal Government contribution, based on present estimates.

The two items which the committee has recommended are, first, a 4-cent gas tax instead of the 2-cent tax now imposed.

In recent years the States of Maryland and Virginia have increased their gas tax to 4 cents and 5 cents a gallon, so the people of Maryland and Virginia have been bootlegging gas to their States whenever possible to do so by purchasing at one-half the gas-tax rate charged in the District of Columbia. That situation has been indefensible, and no objection should be found to immediate favorable action upon that increase.

The automobile tax in like manner has been indefensible because the District imposes a license fee of $1 with a nominal personal-property tax, whereas the average of the 22 cities reaches $14, including trucks and other motor vehicles. Again the result is found in the fact that a large number of nonresidents are enabled to take out their license in the District at $1 each, whereas in their home States they would be obliged to pay on the average from $10 to $14 and in some cases more than that amount. These two items standing alone recommended by the committee do not change materially the merits af the tax situation in the District.

In the minority report I have set forth briefly the foregoing facts and given reasons why the full tax should be raised by the District before the various States should be called upon for any contribution. When the average amount of taxes is paid by the District that is now paid by the 22 comparable cities, the Federal Government should make any additional contribution needed to maintain the present high standards of the Capital City. The additional remarks and minority report explains more fully these facts and is as follows:

ADDITIONAL VIEWS OF MR. FREAR

These additional views express complete agreement with the facts found by the committee concerning proper taxes to be raised by the District of Columbia, rejection of arguments offered of per capita taxes and Federal property offsets presented by the Government's Efficiency Bureau expert, and appreciation of the splendid and exhaustive work performed by Mr. Lord, the committee tax expert. Some familiarity with city, county, and State tax methods, the latter as State auditor for several years, leads me to express confidence that no better analysis of present tax methods in the District and in comparable cities could have been offered by anyone.

To the committee's conclusion of amount the Federal Government should pay toward the District's support as an annual subsidy, I can find no evidence that warrants the amount recommended or any other amount excepting for temporary emergency until the District is enabled to raise additional revenues found by the committee proper District contributions to the District's support, if measured by comparable cities.

Briefly, the committee finds that 22 comparable cities and the several States in 1930 averaged the following additional tax and license income that these cities are now paying, many of them far beyond the average stated. I believe like revenues should also be raised by the District of Columbia for its own support:

Increased gas tax	$1,600,000
Increased motor-vehicle tax	1,000,000
Increased intangibles, income and estate tax	1,500,000
Increased public-utilities tax	640,000
Increased railway tax (tunnels, bridges)	175,000
Increased real and personal tax	9,000,000
Total increase found equitable	13,915,000

The committee only asks for the following additional tax and license revenues to be raised:

Increased gas tax to 4 cents	$1,600,000
Increased motor-vehicle tax	1,000,000
Increased estate tax	750,000
Increased income tax	750,000
Total	4,100,000

The above estate tax, by deduction of Federal tax refund, is no net increased burden to District taxpayers.

Thereafter the committee's report recommends that Congress appropriate an annual contribution not to exceed $6,500,000. In view of the fact that the annual District contribution for years has been $9,000,000 and that for the present fiscal year it was increased to $9,500,000, it is hard to understand on what theory the proposed Federal contribution of $6,500,000 is recommended to Congress. That amount, added to the revenue specifically recommended to be raised of $4,100,000, would give the District $10,600,000, or $1,100,000 in excess of the amount of revenue now received without any reason offered therefor. If the District raised the revenue found to be received by 22 comparable cities, it will receive annually, approximately, $14,000,000 additional, or $4,100,000 more than is now received from all sources.

Mr. Speaker, remembering, as set forth specifically by the committee findings that no national capital in the world with one exception, Argentina's, and no State capital in this country recognizes any duty or obligation to contribute any amount toward the local city government excepting for minor specific services, it is impossible to reconcile the committee findings of fact with the conclusion that Congress should make an annual appropriation of $6,500,000, or any other amount, for the District support, subject to any temporary needed aid, until the District can have time to put its own tax machinery in order.

For more than a half century fiscal relations of the District and Government have been a matter of constant controversy. This is set forth in the committee report, but I speak also from personal knowledge during a large part of that period. Constant propaganda by local press and interested individuals and organizations have brought about several so-called investigations, but no appreciable reforms.

As one appointed to serve on this committee, without personal desire or expectation on my part, I believe the committee was called upon to present the facts with a fairly constructive proposal to Congress, based on its investigations, unaffected by local press criticism or other propaganda that always seeks to discredit or minimize such reports.

Without a just and proper settlement of the differences between a portion of the 487,000 residents of Washington, on the one hand, and the rights of 120,000,000 people living in the 48 States who contribute toward the annual District deficit, on the other, nothing will be accomplished and the same local tax complaints will continue.

When District business and private interests pay the average tax burdens borne by the rest of the country that now contribute to the District deficit, the Federal Government represented by Congress will not fail to appropriate additional amounts where necessary. That it should do.

Let it be remembered the District was set apart originally by the Constitution with exclusive legislative jurisdiction given Congress for Capital purposes. Those coming here for resident or business purposes were so apprised and knew that ordinary rules of taxation and District support by those having privileges of residence in the Capital were not to be modified or changed.

Those owning property in the District of Columbia should pay for that privilege, in equal proportion to taxes paid in other cities of comparable size and general character that now contribute both to the Federal Government's support and to the District's separate support. Practically all other capital cities do so. What good reason exempts the District?

When the fact is established that District tax rates are lower than in any comparable city in the country, as found by the committee, it is unjust for Congress to grant any appropriation until the rates are equalized. No just basis for any Federal Government District contribution can be found until this tax is adjusted, for these other cities now contribute toward State and Federal Governments and in addition are called upon to pay toward the upkeep of the District.

When its fair share of tax burden is borne by the District, it will be the duty and certainly the purpose of Congress to contribute whatever is necessary to make the Capital City a beautiful, healthful, and great city, second to none in the world.

That information Congress is entitled to, and it has been furnished from the hearings and facts which are analyzed, adopted, and placed before Congress by the committee report.

I shall not presume to repeat complete answers offered by Mr. Lord to District arguments, which appear in different parts of the committee's report, but I ask attention to that part of the committee's report based on Mr. Lord's analysis of all the records in which the committee says of by far the largest taxable item:

> The adjusted tax rate in the city of Washington, based on the assessed valuation of all real and tangible personal property at a ratio of 90 per cent of its actual value is the ratio that the assessor, Mr. Richards, advised the committee is the ratio at which he assessed property, or $15.30 per thousand dollars valuation * * * the average adjusted tax rate for all the 23 cities, including Washington, is $23.68 per thousand valuation, or $8.38 more than the $15.30 rate that obtains in the city of Washington. Excluding the city of Washington, the average adjusted tax rate in the other 22 cities is $24.21, or $8.91 per thousand more than obtains in the city of Washington.
> In this connection, if we take a piece of property having a full value of $10,000 and apply the adjusted tax rate, we find in the city of Washington the owners of such a piece of property would pay a tax of $150, compared with the average tax of $242 paid by the remaining 22 cities.

From that committee report it is disclosed the Washington tax rate collected is about 63 per cent of the average rate paid by the other 22 comparable cities. All the tables and data placed before us warrant and sustain the above finding.

Comparisons of city management, State, county, and other taxes and bond issues are all treated in the committee report. Washington and the District have no bond issues, because the District has been enabled to pay as it goes, through the continued subsidy paid by the Federal Government that does not obtain elsewhere in the world.

That is only referred to in disclosing one of several arguments advanced by District witnesses who professed to believe 22 comparable city tax payments ought not to govern, because of local conditions now covered by the $9,500,000 annual Federal subsidy.

The committee report effectually answers all such arguments and with that feature of the report unanimously adopted, I heartily agree. Having unanimously agreed also in the several findings of fact wherein the District is disclosed to be undertaxed on every important item I have adopted conclusions in conformity with the committee findings.

It is disclosed by the 1930 tax report that Washington has $1,182,453,345 worth of real property on its tax roll, exclusive of Federal property, taxed at $1.70 per $100, producing that year $20,101,877; personal property reported was $107,206,520 also taxed at $1.70 rate per hundred, producing $1,822,510; intangible property reported was $545,188,143, taxed at only a 50-cent rate per $100, producing $2,725,940.

In other words, the tangible personal property of Washington is about 9 per cent of the real property, and the intangible is nearly one-half of the real property, but instead of receiving $9,265,500, if taxed at $1.70 per $100, the same rate as real property or intangibles, it is taxed at 50 cents per hundred and so returns only $2,725,940. No justification of the small rate is offered.

This illustration is no reflection on the assessor or District Commission but shows the inadequacy of a tax system compared with local income tax, gift and inheritance taxes that ought to be made a part of the District system because of fairness and means of better enforcement. I agree with the committee's action in these minor tax measures but also believe other more important undertaxes should be likewise increased.

Mr. Speaker, the committee's tax expert has collated reliable facts, in my opinion, that disclose, if the District pays taxes equal to those paid by 22 comparable cities, it should have paid in 1930 approximately $14,000,000 more than was paid by favored District taxpayers. The estimate, I understand, is probably under the actual amount that should be collected.

A few items are here briefly discussed that rest on these findings of fact. The committee report states that the gasoline tax of the country ranges from 3 cents to 7 cents per gallon in 45 States, with 3 States retaining a 2-cent tax rate.

Maryland has a 4-cent rate, West Virginia 4 cents, Virginia 5 cents, and North and South Carolina levy a tax of 6 cents per gallon. These are rates of States near the District. The committee report recommends a rate of 4 cents, slightly less than the average tax rate imposed on gasoline by the several States.

It is clear that a rate of 4 cents a gallon is more just and equitable, because all the 48 States are now contributing to the $9,500,000 fund which represents the District's needs. A 4-cent gas-tax rate, according to the report, will add approximately $1,600,000 to present District tax receipts and help meet any deficit.

The motor-vehicle tax, according to the report, if raised to an average of $14 per car, the average paid in 1930 in the United States, will increase receipts from that source approximately $1,000,000. The average motor tax paid by 48 States which contribute toward the $9,500,000 deficit in District income emphasizes the justice of continuing the increased gas and motor tax principle to a like increased real estate and personal property tax. This increased rate is found in the comparable 22 States to be an adjusted average of $24.21 per thousand dollars, compared with $15.30 now paid by the District on an increase of $8.91 per thousand on such taxable property.

An average inheritance or estate tax, the committee report finds, at a reasonable rate will produce an annual revenue of "not less than $750,000 annually." That is a proper tax, which will help reduce the District deficit of $9,500,000 now paid by the 48 States, and should be enacted into law. Due to the 80 per cent refund or credit on Federal estate-tax collections, this is no added burden to the District taxpayer, but on the contrary is a net increase in the Federal Government's District contribution.

The committee finds an average income tax will increase the income now received from intangibles "by not less than $750,000 annually." The tax should also be imposed by Congress that equally represented the 48 States which now annually contribute $9,500,000 toward the District revenue deficit. These tax increases, the committee is informed, are very conservatively estimated.

The committee finds that an ad valorem tax on public utilities, a just method of taxation, would increase District receipts from that source from $1,611,000 collected in 1930 to $2,500,000, or $900,000 annual increase with which to help reduce the $9,500,000 annual District deficit now contributed to in part by the 48 States. If assessed at 90 per cent of true value, then $640,000 would be the increase. That tax should be collected for reasons already advanced.

The committee finds that if instead of exempting specific railway property, such as tunnels, bridges, and so forth, against the protest of the city assessor and ordinary tax procedure, additional receipts from this needed correction would add approximately $175,000 to the District annual revenues with which to meet its annual $9,500,000 deficit. It is a small comparative item but certainly a proper increase.

In the largest item of undertaxation, real estate and personal property, the committee finds in effect that if the District imposes an average tax rate of $24.21 per thousand on the average adjusted rate paid by 22 comparable cities as set forth in the hearings, an increase over the $15.30 Washington adjusted rate now paid will bring to District revenues, based on 1930 receipts, $31,222,907, or $9,298,520 additional annual receipts from this item, with which to meet the $9,500,000 deficit now found in District collections.

By far the larger part of this committee's work was employed in developing this $9,298,520 undertax. It is nearly two-thirds of the $14,000,000 undertax in the District disclosed by the committee. If brought up to average tax rates in 22 comparable cities the committee finds this one item would practically offset the Federal Government's $9,000,000 annual contribution in past years.

No logical reason is offered for failing to recommend this justified increased tax.

The committee adopted in its report the results found by its tax expert, Mr. Lord, who, after a long and voluminous correspondence and questionnaires sent to officials and business organizations in all comparable cities, secured all available data. This investigation covered 23 comparable cities, of which Washington has the lowest comparative adjusted tax rate of $15.30, compared with a high tax rate of about double that of Washington in one or two cities and an "average adjusted rate of $24.21, or $8.91 per thousand more than obtains in the city of Washington." Actual values and tax rates were brought down to a common basis, as disclosed by tables and other data in the hands of the committee.

The 23 cities and adjusted rates so found are as follows:

City	Rate	City	Rate	City	Rate
Louisville	$30.80	Jersey City	$30.34	Newark	$29.55
Boston	29.26	Memphis	28.94	Seattle	28.56
Minneapolis	28.54	Buffalo	27.67	Portland	26.89
Pittsburgh	26.60	Milwaukee	26.34	Denver	24.26
Rochester	24.01	Baltimore	23.40	Cleveland	23.08
Atlanta	21.70	San Francisco	20.20	Dallas	18.18
Cincinnati	17.68	St. Louis	17.61	Providence	17.68
Kansas City	17.58	Washington	15.30

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; certainly.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to know whether that includes the State tax.

Mr. FREAR. It includes all, because there is no State tax. In the District the $9,500,000 subsidy is taking care of all District taxes. No county or State tax can be properly considered here.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I mean in these cities, because if that is so, the figures are not correct so far as Baltimore is concerned.

Mr. FREAR. From the foregoing it appears for illustration that the city of Milwaukee with a comparable population of 578,249 to Washington's 486,869 and an adjusted tax rate of $26.34 or $11 more per thousand than the $15.30 of Washington, is also $2 per thousand above the average tax rate so found. In other words, the total tax paid in Milwaukee is 70 per cent more than the tax paid in Washington.

The city of Milwaukee paid a State income tax of $7,547,403 in 1930 in addition to the Federal income tax and also contributed to the $9,500,000 subsidy granted the city of Washington. For reasons which can be amplified, it is certain Milwaukee is as efficiently managed as the District of Columbia, yet pays a much higher tax.

In a newspaper published in Washington, last evening's edition, you will see the contribution from the District of Columbia, how much more it pays than it receives back from the Federal Government. I want to give now two or three illustrations that might be interesting.

In a large majority of the comparable cities additional rates on automobile, gas, and other items have been paid in recent years, allof which are now recommended for Washington to pay, as the proposed Washington rate. This would produce $14,000,000 additional revenue on the average rates collected in 22 comparable cities named.

Contributions to the Federal Treasury and payments back to the contributors are studied by the States more than by local beneficiaries.

For 1930, the same year, the following payments and receipts by and from the Federal Government are noted in several of the States.

Pennsylvania paid in $230,202,064; percentage returned, 3.1.
Michigan paid in $137,076,199; percentage returned, 2.8.
Illinois paid in $247,137,637; percentage returned, 1.7.

Among the smaller payments were—

Wisconsin paid in $35,512,796; percentage returned, 12.3.
Tennessee paid in $16,478,693; percentage returned, 15.5.
Texas paid in $38,884,521; percentage returned, 22.6.

The largest payment and the amount returned—

New York paid in $928,955,021; amount returned, $8,727,208, or less than 1 per cent.

The District of Columbia received more than any State in its subsidy, $9,500,000. This discloses another reason why Washington should properly pay the same tax rate as is now paid by 22 comparable cities.

The committee report is supported wherein it briefly discusses and unanimously rejects the Bureau of Efficiency effort to justify present District tax rates by "per capita" comparisons or the setting off of Federal property against local property on the tax roll to determine the subsidy to be granted.

A per capita tax-rate collection comparison of a city or State would be of no relative value for many reasons, some of which are set forth in the committee report. Nowhere in the world, according to the hearings, is it attempted or supported by any tax authorities or communities. Property and not individuals is alone the subject of taxation, and no averaging of the combined tax paid by Mr. Mellon, who is credited with possibly a billion dollars in property, and that of his butler gives any relative data for their separate holdings or those of any other two individuals. Another plan was suggested by the Efficiency Bureau of setting off Federal Government property against District property, with estimated sentimental, monumental, and other values on public buildings. It also included personal property belonging to the Government reaching $180,000,000 but slashed to $90,000,000 because of "depreciation." Added $90,000,000 of intangible Federal property for money in the Treasury, debts, credits, and so forth, afforded an equally novel but unsound tax theory.

That policy, known nowhere else in the world, if of any value or justification, would warrant charges against the national governments of all other countries and also of hundreds of cities in our own country containing Federal buildings, lands, and other personal and intangible property. States with national parks and many millions of forest and other lands would be knocking at the doors of Congress for like subsidies on that argument offered by the Bureau of Efficiency.

These additional views are filed with no conscious prejudice for or against District residents. The same consideration only is asked which every Member would have for his own district and State, a square deal not induced by fear or extraneous arguments or one which could not be successfully defended before any jury of taxpayers drawn from outside the local district. For reasons set forth by the committee and based on the findings of fact with the 22 comparable cities, it seems impossible to reach any other logical conclusion.

Justice to the remaining 22 comparable cities which we equally represent requires an approach to their average tax collections by the District before they are called upon to contribute any part of their own revenues, however small, to the undertaxed District. This certainly justifies a condition that the District increase its revenues $14,000,000 by taxing its real and personal and other properties the same as the 22 comparable cities.

Let me say I appreciate the spirit of my colleagues on the committee, their unstinted labors in trying to ascertain the facts and reach proper conclusions. Instead of assuming to criticize or find cause for disagreement, these views are offered in a belief that the value of the committee's labors and report should be reflected in a correct tax solution, which may serve as a guide for District tax adjustments, both now and in the future. Some emergency aid until appropriate legislation can be had would, of course, be needed, but any permanent tax adjustment should take into account the findings of fact by the committee. It is for the Congress, then, to make such contribution or subsidies as may be found just and proper. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman limits the subsidy the District receives to the $9,500,000. What about all of the millions that we are spending here for the improvement of the city? They are subsidies also.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, of course there is more than that in direct subsidy. I had to telephone three or four different people at the Treasury yesterday to find out what the total subsidy is. They receive aid from the Federal Government to take care of the militia and in other ways. All I am asking is that when they make statements in the press that the District pays $14,000,000 or $15,000,000, they should also state that they get back this subsidy of $9,500,000. No State of the 48 receives as much, and New York last year paid into the Federal Treasury as stated $928,000,000 to help run the Government. It received back less than 1 per cent. The District received back about 66 per cent or two-thirds of its payment into the Federal Treasury. This is not so important if the District pays the same taxes relatively as other cities. The committee has reported unanimously, based on careful studies, it does not.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] that none of us wanted this assignment, none of us asked for it or thought that we were going to get it. We are trying to do the best that we can in arriving at a just decision.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; certainly.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to know whether the committee took into consideration the State tax that those cities had to pay in addition to the city tax.

Mr. FREAR. The District pays no outside tax, for the Federal Government supplies the fund that meets all its deficit. The comparable cities' taxes paid over the counter were considered.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say that the gentleman has contributed materially to the discussion of this question. As I understand it, these tables of statistics will be published with the report?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Do the minority views approve the correctness and accuracy of these figures?

Mr. FREAR. Every one. I agree with the committee in its findings of facts based on exhaustive studies.

Mr. MAY. It is doubtless true that all of the cities outside of the District of Columbia, for which the gentleman has made comparisons, are suffering from industrial wants that do not exist in the District of Columbia, due to the Government pay rolls and building projects——

Mr. FREAR. Between $150,000,000 and $200,000,000 is disbursed every year here by the Federal Government that stabilizes business, and the Government cares for its own property generally.

Mr. MAY. Is not that additional reason why the District of Columbia should bear an additional tax?

Mr. FREAR. Assuredly. I don't think there is any question about that.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman states that he agrees with the members of the committee as to the finding of fact.

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman state to this committee the difference in the policy as suggested by its conclusions and that adopted by the committee in making its findings.

Mr. FREAR. My conclusion is that the people of the District ought in the largest one item to pay $9,000,000 more on real and personal property, and they ought to pay more on their public utilities.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman means to equalize their payment of taxes with the rest of the cities referred to?

Mr. FREAR. Yes. That is what we were expected to study and ascertain. Our conclusions, I believe, should conform to the findings of fact in which we were agreed.

Mr. MAPES. May I say there has been no attempt to cover the subject matter of the report which the committee has filed in detail. The members of the committee took this means of calling the attention of the House to the report, and we express the hope that those of you who are interested in it will read it and the bills and the reports accompanying it, which the committee has submitted.

There are some features of the report which have not been referred to in the statements made this afternoon. We would be pleased and complimented if the Members of the House generally would read the report as filed to-day.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman inform the Members when the report and the copies of the bills will be available?

Mr. MAPES. I think late this afternoon. If not, the first thing in the morning.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Do I understand that concludes the debate by the members of the Special Committee on Taxation in the District of Columbia?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the President's message.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the President's message, with Mr. LOZIER in the chair.

Mr. PURNELL. May I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD] if he will permit me to yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON] in order that he may attend the session of the Committee on Ways and Means? I think that was the understanding with the majority leader.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I am willing to do that. I had understood that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] was to be yielded time now; but if he is willing, I will be glad to make that concession.

Mr. MCFADDEN. I will be glad to yield to my colleague Mr. WATSON.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON].

Mr. WATSON. The United States under President Wilson's administration assumed in the major part the responsibility of financing the World War. Delegates from our allied nations were permitted, perhaps invited, to appeal in person to the Congress for war loans. Each representative promised that the amount borrowed would be repaid. There is no doubt they were sincere in their statements. Thus the people of the United States, prompted by patriotic obligations, purchased bonds amounting to $10,000,000,000.

The world to-day seemingly is financially bankrupt. Nations claim to be unable to meet their debts. Congress is therefore called upon to extend a 1-year moratorium, hoping for a financial recovery within that period. Groups of men noted for their special qualifications have met many times since the armistice in various parts of Europe to mark a road by which the nations may return to their pre-war prosperity. The unparalleled progress in science within the decade has radically changed the public policies, developed an evolution in material affairs that has involved an economic revolution in the civilized world.

Upon this revolution will be built a new civilization, which will be superior to the present as the present one is superior to that of the Middle Ages. I do not believe that the end of civilization is near; but, to the contrary.

The parliamentary proceedings of the past now governing the actions of men and the legislators of the day, noted for their statesmanship, have failed to solve the present international problem. It will take men schooled in the new, not the old, political science to cut the Gordian knot that will bring the kingdom of prosperity and universal domestic happiness to the world.

The Democratic Party has control of the House. The hope of the Nation rests with the Democratic Congress to solve the intricate problems of taxation in order to meet the war deficit and to adopt a foreign policy that a moratorium of debts will not be extended to an indefinite period.

That there is a serious deficit can not be denied. I would prefer taxes be not increased, but rather exercise strict economy in every governmental department, but this is a political impossibility, a policy that has never been adopted by a nation in any period of history, though facing a repudiation of its debts.

The income and corporation taxes will not yield a revenue as in the past. Railroads are not earning operating expenses; great industries are in default for want of orders; individuals and banks are investing in nontaxable Government and municipal bonds. The decreased earnings of wealth will greatly lessen the receipts, and the revenue bill of 1932 will necessarily carry new sources of taxation.

France has a luxury tax. It is workable, but rather complicated. Its sales tax brings a revenue of about $25,000,000; it is a levy of 2 per cent upon gross receipts.

I am opposed to a moratorium of the foreign debts beyond one year. I can not understand the domestic policy of taxing our people in order that the debtor nations may give work to their labor, build up an industrial policy and a military strength contrary to the interests of the American people.

When Great Britain accepted the debt agreement, Sir Frederick Wise, a member of the British Parliament, in a statement on the external debts, said:

> This is the first time Great Britain has ever had an external debt. It is practically all owing to the United States, and is therefore in dollars. An external debt is a dangerous debt, as the British Government has not the control of it. I think 1923 will be a memorable year by reason of the funding of the British loan to the United States. The Hon. Stanley Baldwin, in arranging this debt on a funded basis, did a great service to the country, and acted as a statesman of supreme quality; by doing so he has saved the country millions of pounds and he has advanced the credit of Britain by millions of dollars in the eyes of the world.

If all the debtor nations had taken the same view as the British statesman, I doubt if the President would have asked for a moratorium. I wish to express very strongly my opposition to temporarily reducing the salaries of Government employees as a policy of raising a revenue. It is nothing more or less than a capital tax—a petty and ignominious method of collecting revenue without expense to the Government.

Mr. PURNELL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON] one additional minute.

Mr. WATSON. I would rather approve taxing every person receiving an income over $2,500 a year if such a policy were really needed.

I recall a Government employee, a married man with a family, who appealed to me for increased salary. After one year of almost continuous effort the increase was granted. When I told him he was successful, he left the office with tears of gratitude. One hundred dollars means a great deal to a Government employee.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD] such time as he may desire.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include several letters, two telegrams, and a statement issued by me as carried by the Waycross Journal-Herald in my district.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD and to include the documents to which he has referred. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, at this time I wish to discuss the foreign-debt-moratorium proposal, the application of the railroads for freight-rate increase, and my idea of real farm relief.

I endeavored to make my position clear on the first two subjects just named by a letter written by me to President Hoover on the 24th day of June last and a statement filed by me with the Interstate Commerce Commission on the 3d day of last August.

I shall now insert each of these documents in the RECORD without further comment, except to say I hope to discuss further both of these in the near future.

The letter to President Hoover is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 24, 1931.

Hon. HERBERT HOOVER,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am just in receipt of your telegram asking for my views concerning your proposal in respect to postponement for one year of all intergovernmental debts.

With greatest personal regards and with full faith in your honesty of purpose, beg to state I am at complete variance with your views on this vitally important subject.

Being unalterably opposed to the cancellation of the debts due the United States by foreign nations, believing that the foreign-debt-settlement program put through a few years ago was the beginning of a total debt-cancellation scheme and campaign, and being convinced that the present debt-delay proposal will constitute a tremendous advance, becoming an entering wedge for a great drive for complete cancellation to follow in the near future, I find myself bitterly opposed to the proposition.

The cancellation of practically all the indebtedness of a financially embarrassed person is certainly very beneficial to him and to his specially preferred creditors, who do not cancel but collect their claims in full together with interest, bonuses, and other tremendous profits. Of course, there is great rejoicing among foreign debtor nations and all international bankers and other big interests in our country and elsewhere who are creditors of these foreign nations or are holders of foreign bonds or have foreign investments and who selfishly feel that real prosperity is embodied in their accumulating more and yet more wealth at the expense and to the destruction of the common people.

The same reasons that are now urged for postponement were advanced for the recent foreign-debt settlements. The same reasons will be set forth a little later for complete cancellation. The motive of the foreign debtor nations, as well as that of the international bankers, foreign creditors, and bondholders, has been, is, and will be, the same. They are not at all concerned about the welfare of the American people as a whole, but are interested in the accumulation of billions of ill-gotten gold.

Foreign investments, stocks, and bonds may temporarily advance because they will be made more valuable by this lavish donation of the money of the American people. This advance no doubt will temporarily help the American bond market. Even farm products for the present may gain a few cents. Why not? With millions and eventually billions of the people's money dished out to great corporate interests, they can afford to return a few paltry pennies.

In my humble judgment, this is but another attempt to usher in prosperity by adding additional wealth to those already a menace to our Nation because of their great wealth. The true criterion of prosperity is not the amount of food in storage but the amount of food that is used, keeping both the producer and consumer from hunger; not the cotton or wool in the hands of the speculator but that which has paid the obligations of the producer and is clothing mankind; and not the money in the vaults of banks or treasuries but the money that is in the hands and pockets of all the people.

When the blood ceases to circulate, the individual faints. If circulation is not restored, death ensues. To-day there is financial congestion in the big money centers. The financial fluid of the Nation is not circulating. There is not only dizziness but a complete financial collapse. Circulation must be restored. Greater congestion will not help but will retard recovery.

Let's not be so concerned about the accumulation of additional money in the hands of the few. Let's get it going on its endless mission of good in the hands of the many. Help the farmer get a fair price for his efforts, the laborer reasonable pay for his toil, and the individual private citizen a good return for his part in the economic scheme of things; then give them a square deal and all the employment they desire, and prosperity and happiness will be abroad in our land.

As water from the highlands on its way back to the sea makes a paradise of a desert, so the happiness and success of honest labor and effort and the money of the many flows back through the channels of commerce to the centers of great wealth, bringing prosperity out of chaos.

Great dividends and the high prices of stocks may not, and oft-times do not, indicate prosperity for all the people. Many times they mean the taking of unfair and unconscionable profits to the detriment of the common people, eventually bringing about a nation-wide financial depression. Prosperity is wealth of the many, not of the few. Idle money in the hands of the few, locked in vaults of steel, is as useless to the masses as the salty water in the bottom of the sea is to the parched hillsides of the desert.

I respectfully contend that the transfer of large amounts of American money to foreign nations, either by foreign-debt postponement or cancellation schemes or other devices, dries up the needed resources of our common people and pauperizes our own citizenry. Foreign peoples get the benefit of money that should be kept here, giving employment to labor and bringing prosperity to our farmers. The present debt-postponement proposal certainly encourages, aids, and abets foreign loans and investments by the international bankers and is in their interest and, as I see the proposition, is detrimental and destructive to the rights of our great common people.

What this country needs to-day is not more help for great wealth, either at home or abroad, but help to the common people so that their prosperity will spread far and wide, covering our whole Nation.

The question is not whether the present suspension scheme will temporarily help big business get more money, but is whether it will permanently help the Nation as a whole—and the common people are an important part of the Nation. The all-important vital question is what good will this suspension of payments of foreign debts do for the farmer who bought Liberty bonds to the limit, sent sons across the sea to suffer, fight, and die in a foreign land, whose home has been sold, or is now being sold, by his Government under foreclosure proceedings, and to whom and for whom his Government has never suggested a moratorium of his debts or his interest, but with a ruthless hand is demanding of him payment in full as is "nominated in the bond." What good will this suspension scheme do the millions of laborers who are out of a job and are begging for bread? What good will it do the millions of mothers and fathers whose boys are buried in Flanders fields? What good will it do the millions of naked freezing backs and hungry mouths in our own land? What good will it do the mother of the unknown soldier with her son buried yonder in Arlington while she is ragged and cold in a bread line, with her Government refusing to appropriate money to buy her a bowl of soup, while it is graciously donating millions of money—her money, and money of other fathers and mothers like her—to peoples of other nations across the sea?

At the close of the World War foreign nations owed the United States enough money to have paid off every loan and all taxes for many years on every farm of every farmer in America, and to have built every farmer a good home, and installed a farm-relief program that would have insured the prosperity of the American farmer and his folks forever.

What are we doing with these enormous assets? The answer is unbelievable. This Government we love to call ours is donating practically the whole of this enormous amount of money to foreign governments and peoples, is foreclosing with an iron hand loans under Government control against the homes of the American farmer when interest is past due, is taxing manufactured tobacco more than twice as much as the farmer gets gross for producing the raw material, is refusing to loan back to this farmer for production purposes even one-twentieth of the money raised in taxes from tobacco grown by him, is failing and refusing to put into effect any really worth-while farm-relief program, and is bringing about and perpetuating an economic system which means the ultimate destruction of the farmer, the laboring man, and the individual, independent American citizen and their Government.

My dear Mr. President, these reasons and others force me to respectfully inform you that when the present foreign-debt-suspension proposal comes before the Congress I shall vote "no."

With highest personal regards, I am, sincerely yours,

W. C. LANKFORD.

Mr. Chairman, the statement filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 3, 1931.

The INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: I respectfully submit that the greatest problem before our people to-day is what can we do to save the farmer. The next greatest question is what can we do to save the railroads? At the present neither is getting a square deal. The farmer never did get a square deal. The railroads for a long time received their share and ofttimes more than was justly coming to them. This has all changed, though, and both the farmers and the railroads are severely and unjustly suffering from causes which can not be charged solely and only to the present general financial depression. Both should do everything possible to help themselves, and both should receive help at the earliest possible moment from well-considered State and national legislation.

The problems of neither can be fairly solved by increasing the burdens or by making more numerous and complex the problems of the other. For instance, a scheme or device to take the freight and passenger business of the farmer away from the railroads without some special benefit to the farmer would not be a proper solution of any part of the farmers' problems. Neither would a 15 per cent increase of freight rates on farm products be a proper solution of any of the problems of the railroads. Such an increase would injure the farmers, would not help the railroads, and would leave the problems of both more numerous, more burdensome, and more complex. The trouble with the railroads is lack of business. The increase of freight rates on farm products would not give more of this business to the railroads. On the other hand, it will drive this business away from them. Even at the present rates, the farmer is turning his back on the railroads, is hauling by private conveyances, is patronizing the trucks, and letting his products rot in the fields rather than pay freight charges greater than he receives for the products. An increase of freight rates means less farm products hauled by the railroads and more by other means and more to rot and not be hauled at all.

Let the freight charges be made too high on farm products and the railroads will not haul any considerable amount of farm products. The time was when the farmer had to patronize the railroad if he secured fast, long-distance transportation of his products. He was at the mercy of the railroads. That time has passed. With good highways and present methods of transportation, the farmer can absolutely do well and let the railroads be destroyed, except in so far as they serve him in other ways than by hauling his products.

The farmers are fast finding that the economical way to transport their products is by means other than railway freight. They are adopting these methods. An increase in freight rates on farm products will not help the railroads unless they wish to haul more empty cars and less loaded ones. In most instances it does not now pay the farmer to load his products on trucks, carry them to the railroad, reload on a freight car, await their transportation by slow schedules, when they must be unloaded at their destination and reloaded into another truck and finally delivered to the merchant for the wholesale or retail trade. It is a cheaper, quicker, better process to use trucks to carry the products directly from the farm to their final destination.

In order to get and keep the business of the farmer the railroads must give cheaper, better, and quicker service. This is also true as to all other classes of freight and passenger business. The railroads can not win their fight for more freight business by increase of rates, poorer service, slower schedules, more red tape, and fewer trains. Neither can the railroads build up nor even keep their present passenger business by increase of passenger fares nor by taking off trains nor by giving poorer service generally. All these things which many of the railroads are now doing and seeking to do are driving business to competing carriers and away from the railroads.

In fact, it is evident to my mind that the railroads, either knowingly or unwittingly, are destroying their own business and building up the business of the truck and bus lines. For my part, I believe in many, if not in most, instances they know well what they are doing and that there is method in their madness.

I have evidence which convinces me that the railroad officials of some, if not all, the big lines have, with malice aforethought and deliberately, decided to buy up or establish large competing bus and truck lines, drive all business possible from railroads to these lines, destroy and junk all short-line railroads, whether owned by them or others, freeze out all independent bus and truck lines, take off every passenger and freight train possible, discharge thousands upon thousands of train, shop, track, and office employees, effect certain consolidations or mergers and bring about the most gigantic, powerful, and dangerous traffic monopoly the world ever saw.

This scheme, if accomplished, would mean a tremendous loss to the working man, the farmer, and the great mass of American people. Thousands upon thousands of men now employed by the railroads would be forced to seek employment elsewhere. Thousands of miles of railroads would be junked in every State and an enormous amount of taxable property would disappear from almost every county and small city in the Nation. In many counties the tax burden of the average citizen—now almost unbearable—would be almost doubled. The people would be taxed to the limit to keep up the public roads over which this gigantic trust or associated trusts would be hauling passengers and freight without competition. I said without competition, and I meant just that. The independent bus and truck lines, as well as all railroads, except a few through, long-haul, long-distance lines would have been destroyed. This powerful traffic monopoly would be attempting to maintain the same high freight and passenger fares they now have and are seeking to establish. It would be using every device known to the ingenuity of able lawyers to capitalize all such incorporial rights as easements, good will, licenses, or grants, franchises, and so on.

They would go into court and absolutely prove that the exclusive right or privilege of hauling passengers for hire over a public road kept up at public expense is very valuable. It could be easily shown that this right is much more valuable than the right to haul passengers or freight over a railroad owned by the railroad and kept up by the railroad, on which the railroad pays taxes and on which there are operated trains giving employment to thousands of men.

The more the public taxed itself to build good roads and bridges, the more valuable would become the exclusive right of the monopoly to haul freight and passengers over the road owned, maintained, and improved by the public, and the more this giant monopoly could capitalize good will, franchises, easements, and every other known fictitious value to squeeze more and yet more passenger fare and freight charges out of the public. This monopoly would pay no real tax to the various cities, counties, and States. The people would be paying tribute and taxes to this traffic monopoly.

This juggernaut would not be hiring men to keep up its roadbed. The public would be doing this, and this greatest of trusts would be using the public's road, driving the public into the ditch and charging the public for the outrage.

Activities which are to be the entering wedge for this kind of an orgy are already evident on every hand. The camel's nose is already under the tent. The Supreme Court decision generally known as the Baltimore street-railway case, shows the workings of the monopilistic mind in these matters. The situation is acute. There should be prompt action to save the physical railroad properties for the stockholders, financial investors, and the general public, and there should be equally prompt action to save the public roads for the public. The increase of freight rates on farm products or on other easily handled articles will not help save the physical railroad properties for the employees, the farmers, and the great common people; neither will these increases help save the public roads for the use of the public, but will hasten and augment the destruction of both.

The physical properties of the railroads should be saved from destruction regardless of whether the attempt to destroy is by the railroad owners or others. An increase of freight rates on farm products and other easily transported commodities is, in my candid opinion, not in the interest of the laboring man, or the farmer, or the masses, and can only mean further unemployment, unreasonable reduction of wages, and greater tax burdens for the people. It it is not in the public interest that the railroads be permitted and encouraged to engage in the truck and bus business on the public highways in competition with the railroads' own lines.

This can only mean a further increase of bus and truck business by the railroads and a wholesale discharge of employees, and still further curtailment of railway service, finally leading to the destruction of a large part of our physical railroad properties. An increase of all freight rates at this time, to my mind, can only be in furtherance of this shifting of transportation and the economic loss that will be occasioned thereby.

Let me say just here that I am very much alarmed about the present transportation situation. I favor saving the railroads by any and all fair means. Every reasonable law to save them and yet protect the public, should be enacted by Congress at once. I have some well-defined ideas about proposed legislation along this line, as was indicated by several amendments offered by me in the House at the last Congress when the bill to put motor busses under the Interstate Commerce Commission was up for consideration.

The railroads can succeed by rendering the greatest possible service for the least possible charge. It is not right that they should, and they will not succeed by unfair tactics, dishonest manipulations, gross favoritism, basely discriminatory laws or regulations, or by rendering the least possible service for the greatest possible charge.

I believe the railroads can profitably haul the freight of the country cheaper, faster, and more satisfactorily than it can be done by truck lines or by private conveyances. This, of course, means cheaper freight rates, more and faster loaded trains, better service generally and not higher freight rates, fewer and slower unloaded trains, and more unsatisfactory service.

I firmly believe the railroads can very profitably handle the passenger business of the country much cheaper, much safer, and much more satisfactorily than it can be handled by busses or by private conveyances. For emphasis, let me say, I believe the railroads can make train travel so pleasant, the schedule so convenient, fast, and frequent, the passenger rate so cheap, the service so safe and satisfactory until even the owners of automobiles will not use their cars over a parallel paved highway, buying oil and gasoline and taking the traffic risks, but will leave their cars in the garage and use the railroad coach instead. This kind of service, though, means better, faster, more frequent service and more—not less—courteous, skilled, experienced employees.

To my mind, the railroads are about to make an abject surrender rather than wage a noble fight. I fear there is an effort to join the alleged opposition and then, without the firing of a gun or a single skillful maneuver, surrender to themselves. I admit the railroads are not getting a square deal at this time, but I fear they are attempting to put over and perpetuate on the public a deal which will in time become a crime against all humanity. The railroads need help and I feel that the American people and their lawmaking bodies will gladly help them if they will seek to win by becoming servants of the people rather than robbers.

At an early date, on the floor of Congress, I hope to discuss more in detail just how I believe the railroads can win this fight for themselves and the country by giving more and better service to the public at reasonable rates.

For the present, before I conclude, I shall urge a few more reasons why freight rates should not be increased on farm products. All freight charges, by whomsoever paid, like taxes, are in most cases eventually passed on to, charged up to, and paid by the farmers and the common people.

Freights, Pullman charges, and many other similar costs are charged to expense accounts and into the selling price of various commodities, and in the end paid by the consuming public. The big dealer or the wealthy business man pays these things but collects them back in the end. Not so with the farmer or the consumer. What the farmer pays on his products is lost to him. Ordinarily he can not charge his freight cost up to anyone, not even to the consumer. The consumer may repay the freight when he buys the product from the middleman or dealer; but if so, it never gets back to the farmer.

Since practically all freights are eventually paid by the farmer and the consuming millions and since the farmer can not charge his freight cost up to anyone else, it follows that the farmer should be given advantage of a specially low freight rate on his products.

Greatly reduced rates are often given on certain commodities, which would not be shipped at all except for the special rate. This rule should be especially applicable to watermelons, cantaloupes, and many other farm products. A reduced rate on these farm products would increase very much the tonnage handled by the railways.

Let me make the further observation that the economical furnishing and proper distribution of food is most essential to the welfare of the whole people, the safety of our institutions, and the perpetuity of our Nation.

To-day we are in the midst of plenty with our people starving. There is so much food until it is a menace and so much hunger until all shudder at what may come if the present situation continues. In fact, the feeding and clothing of our people is so vital and the products of the farm are so essential to the very life of our Nation that it would certainly be better for all if the freight charges on farm products were reduced to the minimum and the necessary profits of the transportation lines derived from charges on other commodities and from other branches of the service.

It is evident to my mind that freight charges on food and other products of the farm should be greatly reduced rather than increased.

Sincerely yours,

W. C. LANKFORD.

Mr. Chairman, I shall now attempt to make clear my idea of real farm relief. I am letting the two letters or statements just read speak for themselves. They deal with vitally important subjects, but to my mind, in so far as my people are concerned, none is so important as the farm problem, which I shall now attempt to discuss.

I hope to accomplish three objectives by these remarks. First, I want to tell just what I believe to be real farm relief, such as would put the farmers on a parity with other businesses and enterprises, as promised by both the Democrats and the Republicans in their last national platforms.

Second, I want to explain my plan to obtain this much-desired result, and lastly, I want to show wherein I believe my plan to be the only complete solution of the entire problem and better than any other plan.

As I have often stated before, I believe real, pure, and undefiled farm relief will only be obtained when the farmer is enabled to name the price of what he sells as fully as others name the price of what they sell to the farmer.

This can not be done by a single farmer producing a single commodity. Neither can it be done by a small group of farmers. To be effective the plan must be undertaken by practically all the farmers living in the entire United States who produce the particular commodity to be handled.

Cotton and tobacco are the principle basic products grown in my district, so I will use them to illustrate what I would like to see the farmers able to do as the result of honest-to-goodness farm-relief legislation.

I want all the farmers producing tobacco, for instance, acting under an agreement between themselves and the Government, to plant the same proportionate part of their cultivated land in tobacco and plant only so much as can be sold for an average of 20 cents or more per pound. When they plant the crop I want them to know they will get this good price in cash just as soon as the tobacco is gathered.

This would enable the farmer to borrow for production purposes any money he may need, as any person or bank would gladly loan money on a crop the price of which was absolutely sure to be very profitable.

In a few years the farmer would not want to borrow; he would have plenty of money of his own. This happy condition would enable the farmer to diversify and give much more attention to not only the small crop of tobacco allotted to him but to a cotton allotment and other crops.

He would soon be growing much better tobacco and selling it at from 50 cents to a dollar a pound and becoming absolutely independent on a smaller acreage of tobacco and with much less expense, labor, and effort.

This would be real four-square farm relief and, I repeat, can only come from an arrangement by which the farmer will be enabled to name the price of the tobacco he sells as fully as the manufacturer names the price of what he sells to the farmers and others.

This and nothing else will be farm economic equality. Some say this can never be accomplished. I say it can be done. I further say both Democrats and Republicans should quit promising economic equality to the farmers unless they intend to live up to their promises.

How can the farmer be enabled to name the price of what he sells as fully as the manufacturer names the price of what he sells to the farmer? To my mind the answer is as simple as pig tracks. Let the farmers do just what the manufacturers do. Neither can control their prices without controlling both production and marketing. It is all a question of supply and demand.

If the supply is controlled the price can be named within reasonable limits.

The manufacturers by controlling the output of their factories, both by holding down the output and by placing on the market only so much of a particular commodity as can be sold at a given or predetermined price, control and name the price of their goods.

This is the only way for the farmers to elevate and stabilize their prices. It can not be done any other way.

Suppose the manufacturers produced all kinds of goods without limit and then piled them down in warehouses everywhere without regard to the demand for the particular commodities and asked the public to come in and take anything and everything at just such price as they wished to pay. No one doubts what would happen to the manufacturers under these circumstances. They would simply go broke. This is exactly what is happening to the tobacco producers, who are selling their tobacco by this very kind of a plan.

Now, is there some way for the farmer to control his production and the placing of his tobacco and cotton on the market so as to control his prices? I answer this question for the farmers by saying yes. Here is how I say it can be done:

Let us enact a bill providing that when a very large percentage of the producers of tobacco sign a contract giving a governmental agent the right to control the acreage to be planted in tobacco and making this agent the attorney in fact of the farmers, with authority to sell the entire crop of tobacco produced by the contracting farmers, then the Government will in effect guarantee the price of cotton and tobacco to be 20 cents per pound average or above.

The contract would provide that the allotment of acreage shall be a definite percentage of land actually cultivated by the particular farmer for the year. The allotment must be fair to all and must be reasonable. The Government agency would have the complete and full right to sell the entire tobacco crop to whom and whenever the agency wished except that the agency in no event could sell the tobacco below the price guaranteed plus all cost, interest charges, and other expenses.

Also, the agency upon demand must loan to the producer the full amount guaranteed as the minimum price, and must not demand or accept any security other than the tobacco or other products grown under the contract.

Thus it will be seen the farmer would not owe the debt. The product—for instance, the tobacco—would be solely and only responsible for the debt, and the agency must sell the tobacco for enough to pay the debt in full, including all interest and other expenses.

The Government could not lose, as the product must be sold for enough to pay the loan made to the farmer and all other expense. The farmer would be getting a reasonable price named by him through his governmental agency. There would be no unreasonable middlemen profits.

The manufacturers would all get their raw material at the same price without danger of getting loaded up on raw material at a high price only to be wrecked by their competitors buying at a much lower price. All manufacturers could figure a reasonable profit on the same cost price of the raw material and would be better off than under present methods.

The price of the manufactured article would be stabilized and the ultimate consumer would not be injured but would be benefited.

Now, if my plan should be enacted into law and the farmers sign the contracts and the Government make the guaranty fixing the minimum price of tobacco at 20 cents per pound average, would the Government lose? In other words, could the Government under this scheme sell tobacco and cotton at the price guaranteed the farmer? Let us again use tobacco as an illustration and visualize the situation and see just what would happen.

Sufficient contracts having been signed under the law, the farmers having grown tobacco under the contract-control plan, having already borrowed 20 cents per pound average under the agreement that the entire loan and all cost must be paid out of the proceeds of the tobacco, the farmer would not have to sell. The governmental agency could sell whenever it pleased, so it gets enough to pay the loans in full. This agency would have the complete control of the placing of the entire tobacco crop on the market subject only to the limitation of price just mentioned.

The manufacturer must come to the governmental agency to buy the leaf tobacco. It can not be bought elsewhere. The agency represents the farmers, so it is the farmers speaking through him who say, "We have all the tobacco you want at 22 cents per pound; how much do you want?" The manufacturers say, "We want to name the price." The farmers say, "We have made arrangements so we do not have to sell except at a fair price fixed by us. We are going to name the price; the only question for you, Mr. Manufacturer, is how much do you want? We are not selling it by the pile to the highest bidder with you naming the price. We will sell you a carload or a trainload or the whole crop for this year at our price, please. How much do you want, Mr. Manufacturer?" The manufacturer says, "Yes; but you have an overproduction. I will not pay more than 6 cents a pound." The farmers say, "That is none of your blamed business. If we have produced too much, that is our business. We do not have to sell. Buy what you want at our price. Take it or leave it. If we have any surplus after you buy all you want at our price, we will store it and save it until next year and curtail our acreage next year so as to absorb any amount that may be left over."

The manufacturer might suggest that he would not buy at all. The farmers could counter with the idea that the entire crop for the present and future years, then, would be sold to some one else, leaving the manufacturer to go out of business. All the manufacturers might go on a strike and all agree not to buy at the high price. If so, the farmers with their organization could open up new factories themselves or get others to do so with the promise to let them have all the leaf tobacco for the next several years at the fixed and guaranteed prices.

I do not believe anyone will argue that the manufacturers and exporters would not buy under this arrangement. They would simply have to buy, and for the first time in the history of the world the farmers, as free men, would be naming the price of their own products. For the first time since Adam and Eve were driven out of the Garden of Eden, the farmer would be selling his products and not simply standing by with his hands tied while some one takes his products and only hands him a few pennies of the real value of his hard-earned property. He would be selling his tobacco, not forced to let it be taken without a just return. There would be real trading, buying, and selling.

Suppose the manufacturer should say "the price is too high." The farmers and those acting for them would reply, "We know what leaf tobacco is worth. We know what you pay for labor and on account of taxes. We know what your factory cost. We know your every expense. We know the enormous dividends and profits you are making. We know what you can pay for this tobacco. We know you are going to buy at our price. How much do you want?"

Let me say just here that the farmer could not demand and get a price beyond all reason. He could, though, get a fair price. This is all he wants.

As I suggested a little while ago, the manufacturers would be glad to buy at a fixed or stabilized price rather than on an indefinite fluctuating market with danger of their competitors getting the advantage. In fact, the manufacturers would be anxious to buy in order to be sure and get all the raw leaf tobacco needed by them before the crop was sold to others. They would be faced with the danger of one or two large concerns buying up the entire crop and leaving them to close their factories. For these reasons the manufacturers of tobacco would contract with the agency of the farmers for all the tobacco needed before it was planted, to be delivered and paid for in cash at the price determined as soon as the crop of tobacco could be gathered and delivered.

Thus it will be seen that under this plan the farmer, before he started his crop, would absolutely know what he would get for his tobacco.

Now, can this plan be put into effect? I answer yes, if Congress will pass the bill suggested and introduced by me and if sufficient farmers planting tobacco, for instance, sign the contracts.

I firmly believe Congress should pass my plan. It is the duty of every friend of the farmer in Congress and out of Congress to either support my plan or offer something better. I honestly do not believe anything better can be offered. Nothing better certainly has showed up so far.

I have no doubts about the farmers signing the contracts. I have explained the plan to thousands of farmers and am yet to find the first one who, understanding the contract, says he would not sign it. It is so simple and easy to understand. On every side and from every source comes the information that unless there is a control of production and marketing there can be no control of prices.

So my plan is for the Government to say to the farmers, "Let us control within reasonable limits your production and the placing of your tobacco on the market, and we will guarantee you a good price." The farmer simply says, "I accept the proposal," and the contract is made.

Some have said that some farmers would not come in and sign but would plant all they wished, make a "killing" and wreck the whole scheme. To begin with these fellows would not be good neighbors and would find themselves very unpopular trying to live among other people who are striving honestly to solve this great question.

Then, again, I would provide by law that all manufacturers who bought all their leaf tobacco from the governmental agency be granted a very light tax on their manufactured products and that any manufacturer who bought any leaf tobacco from an outsider be very heavily taxed. This would absolutely prevent anyone endeavoring to wreck the entire scheme to satisfy his own greed. He would find no market for his tobacco.

The law would provide that if a man signed the contract and then planted more than his share, the Government could seize this surplus without pay, as it would be the property of all the farmers who were living up to their contracts.

I would not make the penalty more. The farmers would report violations where the penalty is only the forfeiture of the excessive production. Now, I want to give some reasons why I believe my plan is the best one ever suggested. Here are some of them:

(a) The farmers themselves decide by signing the contracts that they overwhelmingly approve the plan before it goes into effect.

(b) The farmers producing tobacco or any other product may put it into effect as to that product, leaving other producers free to do as they please.

(c) The plan eliminates all middlemen profits and puts an end to speculation and gambling in futures.

(d) Diversification under this plan would be stimulated and made very profitable by the farmer planting much less so-called money crops and getting much more for them.

(e) The poor man and the wealthy farmer are treated exactly alike. Each would know what he would get for his crop before he planted it. Each could get money for production purposes and borrow in cash three times what he now sells his tobacco for, and each could hold his tobacco and ultimately get the highest possible price for it.

(f) The benefits would go directly to the producers and not to those speculating on the farmers. The high prices would be paid to the farmers themselves.

(g) There would be no "equalization fees," charges for price insurance, or other speculative cost or dues. The benefits would be direct, with no export debenture or other speculative help going into the pockets of exporters or other large produce dealers on the theory that part may perchance ooze through to the farmers. The help would be in behalf of the producers and none other.

(h) The control is on acreage and not on amount of production, thereby encouraging more intensive and better cultivation of the particular allotment.

(i) The control of acreage is not based on the need of money for production purposes, which would only control the poor man, leaving the rich to plant all they please, but is based on the need for a fair price, bringing the poor and the rich alike within the circle of production and marketing control.

(j) The allotment of acreage is based on the number of acres the particular individual plants in other crops, thus preventing 1-crop farming to the detriment of the general farmer.

(k) The plan is nation-wide, with definite guarantees to the farmer rather than sectional, sporadic attempts to control production, with no guaranty to the producers. It is by mutual contract under control of the farmers and their friends rather than by the strait-jacket of law under the police authority of the States or Nation.

(l) The plan is under the contract provisions of the Constitution and provides a fair, mutual, elastic method whereby the farmers of the Nation may become a free and independent group of citizens.

These are only a few of the reasons which persuade me to humbly urge my plan as the best possible solution of the farm problem.

Mr. Chairman, I am not arguing that there is no merit in other farm-relief proposals. I have supported and voted for some of them, but all the while my judgment has been that the only proper solution is by my contract plan. During the past summer I had repeated conferences with members of the Federal Farm Board and urged in every way possible the controlling of production, marketing, and prices of farm products by a contract system.

In this connection let me insert here some letters and telegrams which are self-explanatory. On August 12, last, after the Federal Farm Board had advised the destruction of one-half of the cotton crop, I wired each of the governors of the 10 largest cotton-growing States as follows:

Am urging the Federal Farm Board that rather than destroy any part of cotton already produced, a far better plan would be to perfect an arrangement whereby one-half of present crop will be delivered into the custody or control of Federal Farm Board or a joint Federal and States agency under a contract between this agency and the farmers whereby the farmers of the whole Nation obligate themselves not to plant any cotton next year or only so much as is approved by the agency, and the agency on the part of the United States Government or United States Government and the cotton-growing States obligates itself to hold off the market all cotton now turned over to the agency plus all cotton now held by the Federal Farm Board until such time as the farmers can get a fair price for their cotton. Let this contract hold good from year to year provided the plan stabilizes the price of cotton at a reasonable and profitable price to the farmers. This contract system of controlling production and marketing so as to elevate and stabilize the price of cotton, tobacco, turpentine, and other farm products has been advocated by me for years as the only solution of the farm problem in so far as certain basic commodities are concerned and should be put into force at the earliest possible moment not only as to cotton but as to tobacco, turpentine products, and all other products where the farmers in sufficient numbers are willing to make the contracts. Destroying a large part of the present cotton crop would no doubt cause balance of the crop to sell for more than whole crop, but why ask the farmers to destroy a large part of their crop only to immediately begin making more cotton at great expense and hard labor when a better result can be obtained just as easily by holding part of this year's crop over to next year and relieve the farmers next year of again producing another crop of cotton?

On August 13, 1931, I sent the governor of my State a letter, as follows:

AUGUST 13, 1931.

GOV. R. B. RUSSELL, Jr.,
Atlanta, Ga.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: With further reference to the proposal of the Federal Farm Board to destroy one-third of present cotton crop, concerning which I wired you on yesterday, I wish to state that I construe the suggestion as an admission that the present farm board act is a failure and that Congress has not yet solved the farm problem. I quote from to-day's issue of one of the leading Washington dailies as follows:

"It is a humiliating commentary upon modern intelligence and boasted American efficiency, an ignominious confession of failure to regulate consumption and distribution, when with superabun-dance and want existing side by side no better means of equalization have been devised than the destruction of products valuable for food and clothing. What has come over American efficiency that it stands dumb and impotent when wheat and cotton must be burned or left rotting in the field while millions of citizens are in need of both?"

This item is from a paper which is recognized as the mouthpiece of the big interests and as unfriendly to agriculture, and shows how the public—both friends and enemies of the farmer—feels about the proposal of the Farm Board and the laws Congress has heretofore enacted in the name of "farm relief."

I construe the proposal to destroy one-third of the present crop as a mere gesture and as an effort to shift to the States and the governors of the States a responsibility which belongs to the Federal Farm Board and Congress.

Again, let me add that the proposal is unfair in that there is no offer to destroy one-third of cotton which has passed out of the hands of the farmers and is now held by the stabilization corporations, a creature of the Farm Board, neither is there any suggestion or proposal for the destruction of any part of the cotton of last year or this, already sold by the farmer and now held by the speculators.

The proposal, as usual, is for the farmer to suffer all loss and others to share all benefits and gains. The destruction of part of crop would make untold millions of dollars for those who now are owners of cotton, not as producers but as purchasers.

Under a contract plan as suggested by me on yesterday there would be no destruction of property or special benefits and favors to cotton speculators as against the farmers, but all burdens and benefits would be shared equally by all.

Under separate cover I am mailing you some speeches I have made in Congress from time to time on the solution of the farm problem by a contract system for the control of production, marketing, and prices of farm products.

With highest regards and best wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

W. C. LANKFORD.

Mr. Chairman, an identical letter was sent to each of the governors of the 10 largest cotton-growing States.

I not only personally discussed this problem with the Federal Farm Board but I filed written statements and letters with the board in support of my position. One of my letters to the chairman is as follows:

Mr. JAMES C. STONE,

Chairman Federal Farm Board, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: With further reference to the farm problem, let me say that we have come to the parting of the ways. I believe the farm problem must be solved now or never.

With the Federal Farm Board the hour has struck; the time for a great decision of a momentous question is here. It means life or death for the farmers of the Nation. It likewise means life or death for the Federal Farm Board. There is but one remedy for the farmers and the board. Each can by a mutual arrangement protect and save the other.

The present deplorable cotton, tobacco, and turpentine situation in the South furnishes the Federal Farm Board the great opportunity. The board must make good now or never. There can be no opportunity without a way. What is the way? Here it is:

Let the board, through stabilization corporations, begin buying all of these products—cotton, tobacco, etc.—offered by the original producer for sale, and continue to buy until the price advances to a fair minimum price; let the board store the products and declare the purpose of the board not to sell any of such products now owned or hereafter purchased except and until the board can dispose of same at a price sufficient to net the farmer the fixed fair minimum price after payment of all storage and other holding expenses; the board paying the present selling price as the initial payment and making additional advances as the market price advances until the fair minimum price is finally paid to the farmer.

The undertaking or contract on the part of the board to purchase would, of course, be limited by the amount of money now appropriated and hereafter made available by Congress, and the contract on the part of the Federal Farm Board to hold the product beyond 12 months would and must be conditioned upon an arrangement to be worked out by Congress or the States, or both, giving the board the right by law or a contract system, or both, to bring about and make such reasonable and fair curtailment of the acreage of the particular product as the board may determine.

This program, if instituted by the board, would be the beginning of real farm relief, and if it failed the responsibility would be on Congress. The board would have done its duty and the farmers will do theirs if given a chance under this plan.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me beg you and the board to use every possible force at your control to help the farmer in this trying hour. There never was a farm situation so serious and, to my mind, there never was an opportunity to serve the farmer with such momentous possibilities.

Assuring you of my desire to cooperate most fully with you and the board in your efforts to solve this great problem, and with best wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

W. C. LANKFORD.

Mr. Chairman, let me say I do not want to lose faith in the Federal Farm Board. The law under which it operates is a failure. Let us amend the law so as to provide for real farm relief. Let us save the board, but let us make it an instrument for good rather than for evil.

On August 18, 1931, the same day I wrote Chairman Stone, I issued a statement for the press briefly giving my views on the farm problem from a legislative standpoint. This statement as carried by the Waycross Journal-Herald of my district is as follows:

CONGRESSMAN LANKFORD INSISTS ON NEW SYSTEM IN AGRICULTURAL FIELD—GEORGIA LAWMAKER URGES CONTRACTS FOR PRODUCTION, MARKETING, AND PRICES

Congressman W. C. LANKFORD, of the eleventh district of Georgia, to-day issued a statement, a copy of which was mailed to the Journal-Herald for release in this section of Georgia, relative to the agricultural problem.

The statement follows:

"There will be a much greater fight over farm relief at the next Congress than ever before, and, as is usual, probably nothing worth while accomplished. On the other hand, additional serious injury and injustice may be done the farmer.

"The enemies of the farmer and of real farm relief are saying: 'The Farm Board act is a failure, must be repealed, and there should be no further effort to legislate for the farmer.'

"Others are saying: 'Down with the Farm Board; let us have the export debenture.' Still others are shouting: 'Away with the board; give us the equalization-fee plan.'

"There is yet another group who believe that two of the three positions just mentioned are wrong, and even vicious, and that the third has only slight merit, if any.

"It might be all right to repeal the Farm Board act, stop endeavoring to pass so-called 'farm-relief legislation,' and leave the farmer alone to work out his own financial salvation, if just that thing could be done. The trouble is that there are all kinds of laws for every other business, all to the detriment of the farmer. So in simple justice these laws should be repealed or some equally beneficial laws should be enacted for the farmer. It seems almost impossible to enact real farm-relief legislation, and yet it would be even more difficult to repeal all the laws which give others the advantage of the farmer. In fact, the latter is impossible, however much it may be desired by the friends of the farmer. The former is at least possible.

"So it would be not only a mistake but criminal to abolish the Farm Board outright and cease all efforts to pass any farm-relief measures.

"The enactment of the equalization-fee scheme would be even worse. It would be an outrageous crime. In order to determine how much better and more popular it would have been than the present Farm Board act, if it had been included in the present law, let us suppose it is now in effect and that instead of the money the Farm Board is using being furnished out of the United States Treasury it is being raised by assessing an equalization fee on the farmers' wheat, tobacco, or cotton.

"How would the farmer in this year of 1931 like for part of his too few dollars of tobacco or cotton money to be taken as a tax or equalization fee and what would he say when informed that it is being taken to pay big salaries and profits to others and to stabilize the price of his tobacco where it now is and his cotton at 6 cents a pound?

"If the Farm Board act is a failure and unpopular with the farmer when all the money for its operation comes out of the Treasury, how much more outrageous and unpopular would be a scheme which could not possibly boost farm prices any more than the Farm Board does, but would probably do even more harm and with an iron hand extract exorbitant charges from the farmers for the outrage.

"The export debenture would indirectly pay a bounty to the exporters of cotton, tobacco, and certain other farm products, on the theory that a part of this money will in some way ooze through the pockets of the exporters and other middlemen and eventually get back to the farmer who grew the particular product. It is urged that it would help the price also of the product sold in the United States. It is problematical whether or not it would help the price of either exports or other products except such and when actually exported.

"Even if it should temporarily help the farmer it would be an indirect bounty on production, encouraging overproduction, which is now sought to be cured by all kinds of methods. Like a dose of morphine it would not last long enough and probably leave the farmer in as bad or worse condition than before.

"It is an unfair scheme, but as just as the tariff, and has the same evil device of helping the big dealer or wealthy organization on the idea that a part of the bounty will later get to the farmer or laboring man.

"If a production or other bounty is justified, it should be paid directly to those to be helped and not to others for them.

"The export debenture can only be justified as an emergency measure, and should be passed, if at all, as a temporary move and not as a permanent solution of the farm problem.

"The members of the Farm Board are not to blame; Congress is to blame for not enacting a better law. The present act should be amended, or if repealed another law should be enacted at once, bringing into existence a plan to control production and marketing so as to elevate and stabilize the prices of farm products.

"It is evident that this can only be done effectively and permanently by a proper contract system controlling production, marketing, and prices."

I wish I had time to read into the RECORD the many encouraging letters I have received from farmers of all sections indorsing my farm-relief plan. I will quote briefly from a highly appreciated letter received by me, on the 20th of last August, from that loyal friend of the farmers, and all-round good citizen, Hon. W. W. Webb, of Hahira, Ga., who so long has given the best within him for the cause of cooperative marketing and the welfare of his people.

I quote from Mr. Webb's letter as follows:

I have taken it upon myself to write the Farm Board in Washington again with reference to aiding the farmers in saving and preventing a total loss of the cotton crop. I believe that if we could make an announcement that the Federal Farm Board would make a liberal advancement on the cotton provided the farmers would agree to reduce the acreage to enough in 1932 to take care of the surplus, we could get them all in immediately. This is in accordance with your plan. In my letter to the Farm Board I called their attention to this being your plan and advised that they call you in conference with them. I believe that we could secure a contract from 100 per cent of the farmers in Georgia to reduce the acreage as desired by the Farm Board.

Mr. Chairman, I now insert my reply to my good friend as follows:

AUGUST 20, 1931.

Hon. W. W. WEBB,
Hahira, Ga.

MY DEAR FRIEND: I appreciate very much your letter of the 17th instant and thank you for again approving my plan of controlling production and marketing by contracts so as to elevate and stabilize the price of cotton, tobacco, and other basic farm products. As you and I have so often agreed in our discussions of this subject, there can be no real farm relief without a maintained scale of much better prices; there can be no effective price elevation and stabilization without an effective control of both production and marketing; and these are only possible by a mutual contract between an agency representing the Government and the farmers.

This kind of an arrangement would have prevented the present deplorable condition of our farmers. If properly put into effect at once it would solve the present farm emergency and constitute real and permanent farm relief for the future. I have wired and sent air mail letters to all the governors of the cotton-growing States urging the adoption of the contract plan of production and marketing control as a means of elevating prices, and during the last 10 days I have had several conferences and filed two written statements with the Federal Farm Board urging the merits of the contract plan.

The plan submitted by me to the board is as follows:

"Let the board, through the stabilization corporations, begin buying all of these products—cotton, tobacco, etc.—offered by the original producer of same, and continue to buy until the price advances to a fair minimum price; let the board store the products and declare its purpose not to sell any of such products now owned or hereafter purchased except and until the board can dispose of same at a price sufficient to net the farmer the fixed fair minimum price after payment of all storage and other holding expenses, the board paying the present selling price as the initial payment and making additional advances as the market price advances until the fair minimum price is finally paid to the farmer.

"The undertaking or contract on the part of the board to purchase would, of course, be limited by the amount of money now appropriated and hereafter made available by Congress, and the contract on the part of the Federal Farm Board to hold the products beyond 12 months would and must be conditioned upon an arrangement to be worked out by Congress or the States, or both, giving the board the right by law or a contract system, or both, to bring about and make such reasonable and fair curtailment of the acreage of the particular product as the board may determine."

I shall again discuss this matter with the board in a few days and am so glad you wrote the board giving the plan your approval. Several governors have written or wired me giving either their qualified or full approval to the contract plan. Also, several Senators and Members of the House are lining up with us. The Federal Farm Board is very much interested and I believe will eventually approve it. The board is handicapped in so many ways. Even the law under which it operates is wrong and vicious in many respects. As you know, I had a bill pending which would have given the present board full power to effectively put our contract plan into full operation, but there was a stampede of certain interests not friendly to the farmer, and those in Congress who had not studied the problem and simply wanted to vote for anything labeled farm relief, and the present law is the result.

I am making the fight of my life to get the present act amended so as to not only give the board the power to install the contract system, but require them to do so. I am hoping that before next December the board and even President Hoover will recommend the amendment. We are bound to succeed eventually, but the thing that grieves me is all this delay and the awful losses which the farmers are suffering in the meantime.

Thanking you again for writing me, and with highest personal regards and best wishes, I am,

Sincerely your friend,

W. C. LANKFORD.

Mr. Chairman, in every way possible I am keeping my plan before the people, Congress, governmental officials, and the President of the United States. I want every friend of the farmers to do one of two things. Either help pass my bill or tell me what objection they may have to it. I will gladly abandon my bill if some one will show me some better plan. Until then I am pushing it in every way possible every time I can get a chance to talk farm relief.

While out west last September I read an item in the Livingston (Mont.) Enterprise, from which I quote the following:

WASHINGTON, September 8.

President Hoover to-day sought a way out for American cotton growers, buried under the highest September crop estimate in 16 years, a Department of Agriculture forecast of 15,685,000 bales.

I immediately wired President Hoover as follows:

LIVINGSTON, MONT., September 8, 1931.

Hon. HERBERT HOOVER,
President of the United States, Washington, D. C.:

Am very happy that so many Senators, Representatives in Congress, and other high officials are now advocating the elevation and stabilization of the prices of cotton, tobacco, and other basic farm products by a mutual contract system along the line advocated by me in my conference with you about a year ago. Such a system worked out along proper lines would have prevented the present awful decline in the prices of farm products. I am urging to the fullest extent not only the adoption of an emergency contract relief plan for the solution of the present distressing financial condition of the farmers but also a permanent production and marketing, control and price elevation plan along lines of the bills introduced by me in the Congress from time to time for this purpose and explained and advocated by me in numerous speeches as appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the last several years. A proper contract system is the only efficient permanent way to put the farmers on equality with other businesses and enterprises as promised by both the Democratic and Republican platforms in the last national campaign. In behalf of the farmers of the Nation, I urge you to now help put into effect such a contract system as an emergency move to elevate and stabilize the present prices of farm products. I also plead with you to advocate a permanent contract system of control of production, marketing, and prices of farm products as the only permanent efficient solution of the farm problem.

W. C. LANKFORD,
Member of Congress, Eleventh District of Georgia.

In conclusion let me say I need the help of everyone who believes my plan is right. Let us all get behind the plan and push. Those who oppose this kind of legislation are very obstinate and can only be overcome by the loyal, concerted action of all the friends of the farmers. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN]. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, at this hour the Ways and Means Committee of the House is taking up the discussion of the moratorium bill. I understand that the Under Secretary of the Treasury is at the present moment presenting to that committee the administration's ideas as regards the Hoover moratorium.

I am greatly indebted to the majority leadership of the House for granting me this time to discuss minutely this question of the moratorium. I desire also to observe that at this time, before the bill is under consideration in the House and before the bill has been discussed except by the presentation of the administration's plan in the Ways and Means Committee, the full force of the administration's influence is being exerted to exact the pledges of the Members of the House as to how they are going to vote on the moratorium.

The particular situation I want to mention at the outset is that at the present time the Hoover moratorium has been succeeded by the operations of the Young plan, brought about by the recent conference in Washington of the Premier of France, M. Laval, and the President of the United States. Under that plan the Germans have asked for a moratorium as provided by law, and the committees appointed under that plan by the Bank of International Settlements have been engaged for the past week in determining Germany's capacity to pay. In addition to that the committees of the international bankers are also at work studying the short-time debt situation and Germany's capacity to pay the short-term debts. It is well for you to keep in mind that there is much confusion as regards the short-term debts. The matters in which the international bankers are particularly interested at this time are the acceptance credits. Those are the short-term debts that are referred to.

On June 20, 1931, while Congress was not in session, the President of the United States, acting without any legal or official authority, for the benefit of a foreign country with which we had lately been at war, proposed and virtually brought about a loss to this country of $245,000,000 in one single year and paved the way for much greater losses for this country to sustain in all the years that follow after. Worse than that, he proposed that the Congress of the United States should unlawfully dissipate the resources of this country by giving the money which was due to us under contract, and which should have been paid to us and of which we are the trustees for the people, to foreign nations which have no claim upon us and through them to that foreign nation with which we have lately been engaged in war. In short, he proposed that we should take money away from the men and women and children of this country and give it to Germany. This, in my opinion, was an infamous proposal.

Because it was an infamous proposal, the President of the United States endeavored to find support for his intended action. He was afraid to do this thing alone at the bidding of the German international bankers—the Warburgs; Kuhn, Loeb & Co., of New York; and their followers—all of whom have been engaged in bleeding this country white for the benefit of Germany and themselves ever since the World War came to an end. He was afraid to do it on his own responsibility, because he had no authority to do it in law, either in domestic law or in international law, in morals, in good faith, or under his constitutional oath of office. In fact, it was a violation of his oath of office and a breach of international law for him to do it at all. So, what does he do? He forgets himself and goes so far as to summon the leaders of Congress by telegraph and telephone and asks them to signify their consent to his proposed illegal action in advance. He asked them to give him their votes to sustain his illegal action. He proposed to commit an unfriendly act toward France and he asked certain members of both parties in Congress to sustain him in that course of conduct. He asked them to promise to legalize his unfriendly act. And in advance of the assembling of this Congress which alone has power to make law for this country.

Those of you who were not consulted in this crude attempt at usurpation of legislative power were in effect foreclosed in advance. You were, perhaps, men of no importance in the eyes of President Hoover. Has any President ever so far forgotten the dignity of his office and the limited place of the Executive in this Government as to do a thing like that before? Could anything be more distressing to American pride than such a message to the powers? What constitutes leadership in Congress? Does leadership mean that men of both parties from States where international bankers have their head offices can upon occasion go into a secret conference with the President of the United States, the agent of those bankers, and tell him the little fellows do not count, that they can be held in line and forced to vote "yes" when they might be expected to vote "no"?

Mr. Hoover is not running a coal mine here. He is not a dictator.

I have been here for a good many years. For the past 17 years I have been a member of the House Banking and Currency Committee. For that reason, I presume, I received a telegram last June from the President of the United States asking my consent to the course he wished to pursue. I did not answer that telegram. I am standing here as the Representative of the fifteenth congressional district of my native State, and my vote has not been cast in secret upon a matter concerning which my constituents have had no information and no chance for discussion. This is the place where we make the laws. This is the place where my vote is cast for the fifteenth district of Pennsylvania. [Applause.] I do not vote on matters concerning the welfare of the United States in a telephone booth or in the office of a telegraph company. Consequently, I stand here free. I have made no bargain to vote for the proposal of the German international bankers and the deal Herbert Hoover is trying to put through for them.

But were it otherwise, had I yielded to the importunate demand of the President of the United States, had I been misled by the specious plea of urgency or by any other consideration, and had I afterwards found out what I propose to unravel for your consideration here to-day, I would not feel bound to vote in accordance with a promise that had been wrung from me by unfair means. I would take back such a promise and I would examine the question on its merits and vote according to my conscience and the interests of my constituents.

Do you remember what happened in this country when President Wilson asked the voters to elect a Democratic Congress so that his policies might be put into effect? It was nothing like this bold-faced attempt to usurp legislative functions, to make a law in a small group, and then to peddle it to legislators for their approval. President Wilson's request was nothing like this, and yet the country resented it and refused it and sent us a Republican majority instead of a Democratic one.

After completing his underhanded arrangements by telegraph and telephone, arrangements which savored more of the ways of an oriental potentate drunk with power than of conduct proper for a President of the United States to pursue, Mr. Hoover, with a dramatic flourish, made his proposal, linking it as usual with a lot of false and insincere humanitarianism.

One of the most significant things about the Hoover moratorium was the suddenness with which it was proclaimed. There was nothing accidental about that suddenness, however. The present administration never makes a move of this sort without ordering a spot light beforehand. Months may go into the excited preparation of a deal, but when the moment comes to give the people an official version of what is happening the electricians are ordered to drag in the spots; the sound apparatus is sent for, and the photographers may be seen hurrying toward the White House.

Behind the Hoover announcement there were many months of hurried and furtive preparation both in Germany and in the Wall Street offices of Germany's bankers. The groundwork had to be prepared. The German budget had to be doctored and left unbalanced. Germany, like a sponge, had to be saturated with American money. Mr. Hoover himself had to be elected, because this scheme began before he became President. If the German international bankers of Wall Street—that is, Kuhn, Loeb & Co., J. & W. Seligman, Paul Warburg, J. H. Schroeder & Co.—and their satellites had not had this job waiting to be done, Herbert Hoover would never have been elected President of the United States. They helped select him. They helped elect him.

The Hoover proposal originated in the offices of the German international bankers in New York. William Randolph Hearst has lately made the following statement:

> This plan for revision of war debts, with America paying the piper while war-mad Europe dances, is purely a plan of international bankers, who make money through commissions out of spoliation of their countrymen. One of those bankers wrote me the whole plan months before it was made public and asked my support of it.
> I refused support and I pledged unending opposition to this plan to plunder the American people in the interests of foreign nations, for which most of these international bankers are financial agents.

[Applause.]

You will notice that Mr. Hearst says the plan was presented to him in writing by an international banker months before it was made public. This ought to convince you that it did not originate in the mind of President Hoover. It ought to convince you that it was presented to President Hoover by the same international bankers or one of his followers who presented it to Mr. Hearst and who was rebuked by Mr. Hearst for his cheek and impudence. This international banker was not rebuked by Mr. Hoover. Mr. Hoover, it appears, promised to support the plan, although in his campaign speeches and in other addresses made by him he continued to deny that he was in favor of the object of the outrageous and unpatriotic German banker propaganda for cancellation of war debts and the binding down of American labor to the task of paying the entire cost of the World War.

We have other evidence that this is true. Unknown to the President and his banker friends, an account of the plan was brought to Washington in the summer of 1930, nearly a year before the President appeared before the footlights, and, as master of ceremonies for the German international bankers, made his public announcement. If there was a crisis in German financial affairs in July, 1931, and if there is one in those affairs now, that crisis was well arranged in advance by the German international bankers and no one in Germany took any steps to prevent its occurrence. The plan was brought to Washington and it was divulged to Senators. Closely as the secret was guarded it leaked out nearly a year in advance. This ought to convince you that it was not the result of any sudden emergency in Germany or elsewhere. This ought to convince you that it was a put-up job.

But we have other and equally convincing evidence in regard to the origin of this plan. On October 23, 1931, the German Minister of Communications, Herr Treviranus, publicly stated in Germany that President Hoover began secret conversations with Germany in regard to this plan in December, 1930. That was last December, when our people were suffering from starvation in Arkansas. That was during the last session of Congress when we were struggling to obtain help for the victims of the great drought and the depression. While our minds were occupied with those matters, while our men were walking the streets in a vain search for employment, while the suicide total was mounting, the President of the United States secretly approached Germany and asked her if he could do anything for her in the way of getting her reparations obligations lightened. The German minister, Herr Treviranus, has stated that one of the chief intermediaries in this matter died and it seems as if that chief intermediary might have been Joseph P. Cotton, who died at Baltimore this year. Herr Treviranus has stated that Hoover's negotiations were carried on with the utmost secrecy and we may well believe it.

The Public Ledger of Philadelphia published the following dispatch on October 24, 1931:

[Public Ledger Foreign Service]

GERMAN REVEALS HOOVER'S SECRET—MINISTER SAYS PRESIDENT STUDIED MORATORIUM MONTHS BEFORE ASKING IT—SLOW PAYMENT HINTED

BERLIN, October 23.—Minister of Transportation Treviranus revealed in an address here to-night that, contrary to the general impression that President Hoover's moratorium was the result of a sudden decision, the American President was in intimate negotiations with the German Government regarding a year's debt holiday as early as December, 1930.

The President, according to Treviranus, who has long been intimate with Chancellor Bruening, did not even let his Cabinet members know what was going on. The negotiations, the German minister said, were made more difficult and the result was delayed considerably by the death of the "middle man" the first part of this year. Several of the minister's auditors recalled that the Under Secretary of State, Joseph Cotton, a personal friend and adviser of President Hoover, died about that time.

Previously it was believed that when Mr. Hoover returned from his western trip last June he learned for the first time the real seriousness of Germany's financial situation.

I might state in that connection that the hearings held by the Banking and Currency Committee a year ago last summer, when we were considering this question of the sale in the United States of commercialized German reparation loans, this same Joseph P. Cotton, now deceased, appeared before that committee and gave testimony supporting the issue and sale in this country, as did the Treasury Department, of those commercialized bonds. They were put out in this country by this same group of international bankers at 91¼ and they are selling now between 25 and 30.

Mr. Cotton, not in the record, but in discussion with members of the committee, at the close of the hearings, told of his interest in Germany and the fact that he had a law firm, of which he was a member, with offices located in Berlin.

Here we have the German Minister of Communications, Herr Treviranus, telling us that Hoover did not let his Cabinet officers know what he proposed to do. He worked on his plan under the guidance and at the direction of the German international bankers and he thought he had his secret so closely guarded that the people of the United States would never be able to find out his part in the plot that was being concocted against them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I am sorry, but I prefer not to yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is making very serious charges against the President of the United States, and I was going to ask him the basis of his authority for stating that he was acting secretly with German international bankers.

Mr. McFADDEN. I think the gentleman will be satisfied by the time I finish.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. He proposed to sell us out to Germany. If he had looked about him, he would have seen on all sides the havoc that had been wrought by the exportation of American wealth to foreign countries. He could have seen mortgaged land, bare of goods, with mile-long bread lines in every city, and that havoc and that desolation and those homeless ones would have shown him that the time was ripe, that the international German bankers had got this country down, and would hold it down in the interest of Germany until it capitulated.

In January, 1931, in the city of Berlin, the Hon. Frederic Sackett, the United States ambassador, began and carried on further secret conversations with the German Government in regard to the obtaining of a moratorium for Germany. Subsequently, Sackett came to this country and looked around. He came and saw and, like a conquering hero, he went back to Berlin and told the German Government, with a diplomatic smile, that the time was auspicious. Mark that word "auspicious"! It was not auspicious for the people of the United States, but it was auspicious for Germany and it was auspicious for the German international bankers.

Now you have the facts and you can see how preposterous it was for the President of the United States to make a calculated entry before the footlights announcing his plan as if it were a sudden response on his part to a sudden emergency. You can see how preposterous it was for him to do that.

The 16th day of June was the date set by the German international bankers, the Bruening cabinet, Mr. Sackett, Mr. Hoover, and his associates, for the opening of the great financial offensive against the American people. And how did they begin it? The head of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., Otto Kahn, was in Italy in June on international financial business. The first shot was fired from Italian ground. It was in the form of propaganda—the great weapon of those who do wrong. It appeared in the form of an article in the Christian Science Monitor. I shall read it to you.

ITALY OFFERS TO EASE REICH'S HEAVY REPARATION PAYMENTS—ALTHOUGH EUROPE LOOKS TO UNITED STATES TO CUT GORDIAN KNOT OF WAR DEBTS, THIS OFFER FROM ITALIAN SOURCE ATTRACTS ATTENTION

(By radio from the Christian Science Monitor Bureau)

LONDON, June 15.—A sample of European self-help calculated, it is thought here, to make a favorable impression in the United States is a proposal of Italian origin.

The plan put forward is that those powers receiving an amount from German reparations over and above the amount necessary to discharge their debts should forego this "indemnity," thus giving Germany the necessary immediate alleviation and providing a significant gesture of moral disarmament.

The position is that, whereas Britain, on the basis of the Balfour note, only demanded from its debtors sufficient to cover its payments to the United States, France, Italy, and Belgium, and to a limited extent the smaller reparations creditors, receive payments from Germany markedly exceeding their payments stipulated by funding agreements to Britain and the United States.

Italy, for example, receives on an average $53,425,000 annually on reparations account and has to pay to Britain approximately $20,000,000 and to the United States $22,657,000, leaving a margin of $10,750,000, equivalent to 43,000,000 marks.

A corresponding margin exists in the receipts and payments by France and Belgium, and, therefore, any such remission would supply a handsome measure of relief to Germany's burden.

On the basis of the Spa percentages, which is the system of apportionment, France receives the lion's share of reparations, roughly 52 per cent, as compared with Italy's 10 per cent, and Belgium's 8 per cent. The annual sum accruing to France amounts to $261,625,000.

The Italian offer in a nutshell—believed to have official approval—is, that she is prepared to waive a portion of the reparations receipts if the other beneficiaries do likewise. Its policy is exactly parallel with the position taken on disarmament, namely, Italy is prepared to cut armaments to any figure if other European powers undertake a corresponding cut.

Opposition may be expected from France on the reparations as on the disarmament issue, but if The Hague settlements and the Young plan are to mean what they were designed to mean, namely, final liquidation of financial questions arising out of the World War, there is no doubt Italy has an unexceptional case.

While opinion here adheres to the notion implicit in the Balfour note, namely, that the United States alone can cut the Gordian knot of international indebtedness, it welcomes the Italian proposal and would surely support any official move in this sense.

This article is misleading. I shall come to facts and figures presently and, when I do, I will show you the contract executed by Germany in the Young law and I will show you the force of the settlement to which Germany solemnly set her hand and seal.

Now, why did Italy advertise herself at London as an international philanthropist, a canceler of debts, on June 15, 1931? She did it because she was told to do it. She did it because the German international bankers from whom she is receiving great favors at our expense in the future ordered her to do it. Mussolini is not the iron man. Otto Kahn is the metalliferous man. Mussolini is the needy man. Otto Kahn and his associates are the men who have measured Mussolini's need and who have promised to supply it if he will help them to break the contract Germany made with her creditors and which she now seeks to dishonor and to treat as a mere scrap of paper. Do you think France and her allies will permit the Young law, signed by Germany and other responsible powers, to be torn up in the German fashion of tearing up treaties and laughing at debts? France is saying no and, in doing so, is saying that it will be a bad day for Italy, for any other country, when it joins hands with Germany in breaking what France believes to be a legal contract and protests in setting at naught that international law which goes back through the treaty to the armistice.

Some people no doubt would have been better satisfied if Germany had whipped the United States and maimed another hundred thousand of our soldiers. Some of them think that the treaty of Versailles was not a good treaty. I share that view. The allied armies had a right to march to Berlin and the French could hardly have been blamed if they had set the torch to some of the German factories on the way. Instead of such a proceeding, the Allies made a treaty which embodied great concessions for Germany, all of which were predicated upon her expressed willingness to pay for the damage she had wrought. So far as the war is concerned, and the end of the war, I am satisfied to say that we sent our army to France for a purpose; that it achieved the purpose for which we sent it; and that the American cemeteries in France bear witness alike to our sacrifice and to our victory. I will also say that the present condition of this country and the Hoover proposal bear witness to the revenge that the German bankers have taken on us for the decisive part we took in the World War.

Over yonder across the river lies the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier. Hoover might almost have seen it from the window of the Lincoln study, where, with German emissaries, he planned to nullify the part our soldiers took in the World War and to set at naught the claims of our people to the money they showered upon this Government for the prosecution of the war. It seems prophetic when we remember that Lincoln wrote—and possibly in that very room—the following words:

> Yes; we may congratulate ourselves that this cruel war is nearing the close, but I see in the future a crisis approaching that unnerves me and causes me to tremble for the safety of my country. As a result of the war corporations have been enthroned, and an era of corruption in high places will follow and the money power of the country will endeavor to prolong its reign by working upon the prejudices of the people until wealth is aggregated in a few hands and the Republic is destroyed. I feel at this moment more anxiety for the safety of my country than ever before in the midst of the war.

I am concerned now with the offensive against the French and the American people and against the friendship which has for so long existed between them. I am concerned with the German offensive as it was developed by the German international bankers. Why do I call them German international bankers? I do so because I wish to emphasize the fact that international finance is almost exclusively German. Most of the international bankers are of German origin.

On the very day the propaganda from London announcing Italy's heroic pose was published in the Monitor a second article appeared in that sheet. I shall read it to you.

[Special from Monitor Bureau]

UNITED STATES RESERVES RIGHT TO RECONSIDER POLICY ON WAR DEBTS

WASHINGTON, June 15.—The United States Government has an "open mind" on foreign war debts, it was authoritatively stated at the State Department Saturday, in connection with the discussions in Europe over the possibility of downward revision of the Young plan.

It was explained that the United States Government's policy on war debts and reparations is clearly established, but that in case of a serious crisis, it would "obviously have to consider temporary changes in policy, if that was necessary."

The administration is cognizant of the seriousness of the economic situation in Germany. It is keeping in close touch with developments and is fully informed of conversations going on abroad.

Initiative for action must come from European sources, however. Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of Treasury, and Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of State, are going abroad this month and will meet European leaders, but without any proposal. Their purpose is wholly informative, it is declared.

You will notice the statement in the article I have just read:

> Initiative for action must come from European sources, however.

It will be interesting when this matter goes to trial before the Permanent Court of International Justice to find out whether Herbert Hoover was acting as a legal agent of Germany or as the President of the United States when he made his proposal. If he was the agent of Germany, then Germany violated the solemn covenant of the Young law by procuring his assistance. If he acted on his own initiative as the President of the United States, then I think he is personally liable to the people of this country in a legal way and that those who acted with him are liable also. We can not have an agent of Germany acting as President of the United States.

But the sting of this article is in the tail. It lets us know that Mellon and Stimson are "going abroad this month." They are going to meet European leaders. They are going without any proposal. Their purpose is wholly informative. Mark that word "informative." They are going to Europe to give information. Their purpose is informative. They were not going to Europe to rest.

When Secretaries Mellon and Stimson went abroad they did not travel to Europe on the same ship. Mr. Mellon was the first to depart. By a coincidence he arrived in England on the very day the Italian gesture was reported in the Christian Science Monitor. And here, having told you that the 15th of June was the appointed day upon which the President of the United States ordered the forces who were acting with him to begin the offensive, I will tell you why that day was selected. On the 15th of June France paid this country a large sum of money. Prudently and with a kind of low-class cunning, this payment was gathered in, although the document which was intended to deprive France of her rights under the Young law was fully prepared and ready for emission to the world powers. Do you think that act of cunning escaped the attention of foreign statesmen? Do you think it has increased their respect for the United States?

Mr. Mellon raced through the next few days at high pressure and somebody in London who appears to have been interested in the dissemination of information gave news to the press that he had been invited to come to England by the British Government. This statement was vigorously denied by the private secretary to Ramsay MacDonald, who asserted that the British Government had addressed no invitation to Mr. Mellon and that it had not sent a communication to the Government at Washington to invite it to discuss revision of war debts, or any other question.

Nevertheless, Mr. Mellon, upon his arrival in England, lost no time in entering into a secret conversation with Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and with Montagu Norman, the governor of the Bank of England.

It is a little strange that Mr. Montagu Norman should have been there. As Henry de Jouvenel says, in speaking of this interview:

> Among the personalities present there was one not generally invited to conferences between prime ministers and foreign statesmen. This was the governor of the Bank of England.

You all know who Montagu Norman is and how closely he is linked with certain sinister figures in the banking world. You know that he comes here occasionally and that he transacts secret business with the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. You know that he was suddenly taken ill when the old Tories in England found out what had been happening there and formed a national government and gave up the gold standard. You may remember that without allowing his name to appear on the passenger list Mr. Montagu Norman took ship for Canada and did not return to England until the storm blew over. I presume you know that the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks are the agents of the Bank of England and that of late years Mr. Montagu Norman has had a great deal to do with George L. Harrison, governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. Mr. Montagu Norman did not come down to New York from Canada during his last visit to this continent. Instead of that, Governor Harrison went up to Canada to see him.

Let us leave Mr. Mellon in London for a while and return to Washington sweltering in the heat.

It is the 16th of June. The President of the United States is spending the summer in Washington. He has been hard at work with Henry M. Robinson, who is the Colonel House of this administration, and, like Colonel House, a secret emissary of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., Paul Warburg, and other German international bankers. Robinson's ostensible business is in California, but his real business is here, where he can see the President of the United States every day. Sometimes he goes to the Rapidan. Sometimes he spends several days at the White House. He passes for a Californian friend of President Hoover. I will tell you whose friend he is. He is the bosom friend and intimate of Paul M. Warburg, the man who engineered the great depression, the man who is the chief beneficiary of the losses sustained by the farmers and the wage earners of this country, the man who has stuffed this country full of worthless German acceptances, so that Germany might use them against us to trick us into breaking an international law in her behalf. More of Paul Warburg hereafter. For the present let us keep our eyes on Henry M. Robinson, the Colonel House of the present administration.

It is the 16th of June and the Monitor has published its little story about the generous Italians.

It is the 16th of June and here comes an Associated Press dispatch reading as follows:

[Washington Post, June 16, 1931]

> Always holding reparations and war-debt payments as distinctly separate, the Treasury yesterday made known that recent events in Europe had caused no change in its attitude.

What recent events had caused no change in the Treasury's attitude? There had been no recent events in Europe which could have caused a change in the Treasury's attitude. This article further makes known that, speculation having been aroused by Mr. Mellon's departure for Europe and by Mr. Stimson's prospective European trip, Mr. Mills, of the Treasury, and Mr. Castle, of the State Department, gave assurances that no official business was involved.

I am loath to accuse any man of toying with the truth, but candor compels me to say that, in my opinion, the assurances so given by Mr. Mills and Mr. Castle were intended to deceive the American people. Can we afford to trust our governmental business to men who lend themselves to this kind of deception?

This is a free country with what is supposed to be a free press. Whence came this custom of deceiving the people with carefully prepared misleading statements, artfully contrived releases, and all the other devices of overlordship looking down from a high place with contempt for the wage earner, the farmer, and the man of little or no property?

It is the night of the 16th of June in Washington. The President of the United States is out of town. That, too, was foreseen and provided for. It was a kind of alibi intended to make it easy for him to pretend that a certain crisis had come about in his absence. Now, comes the 17th of June and on that day, as if without knowledge of what was about to happen at Washington, the German ambassador to France goes to the French Minister of Foreign Affairs and to the French Minister of Finances and says that the German Government will soon be obliged to ask for a moratorium. This was a calculated move and Mr. Sackett was fully aware of it. It was done for the purpose of working on French nerves, to try to frighten and unsettle the French so that they might be startled out of their customary caution when they received the communication that the President proposed to make to them and upon which he had been hard at work with Bruening and Sackett and the Warburgs through their emissaries for so many months.

On the 18th of June the President returned to Washington from the tomb of our late President Harding, where he had just descanted upon the infamy of anyone who betrayed the trust of the people in money matters. I call your attention to his words:

"BETRAYAL" IS CASTIGATED

> There are disloyalties and there are crimes which shock our sensibilities, which may bring suffering upon those who are touched by their immediate results. But there is no disloyalty and no crime in all the category of human weaknesses which compares with the failure of probity in the conduct of public trust.
> Monetary loss, or even the shock to moral sensibilities, is perhaps a passing thing, but the breaking down of the faith of a people in the honesty of their government and in the integrity of their institutions, the lowering of respect for the standards of honor which prevail in high places, are crimes for which punishment can never atone.

On the following day, as a part of this conspiracy, the Secretary of State, Mr. Stimson, sent for the French ambassador, Mr. Paul Claudel, and told him what the President was going to do. This, we understand, was about one hour before President Hoover gave out his statement to the newspapers.

Was this fair to the French ambassador when we know that the President had been working on this plan since the previous December, that is, December, 1930? And the plan he gives out is the one that was disclosed to William R. Hearst by an international banker several months before; that it is the same plan that was divulged here in secret to the Senators in the late summer of 1930. It is the same secret plan that the German Minister of Communications referred to in his statement which I have read to you. It was the international German bankers' plan for having the burden of reparations removed from her triumphant march toward world domination. Germany has already surpassed the United States in trade activity. She has had a favorable balance of trade every month so far this year. That can not be said of us who are asked to break the law of nations for her benefit. But the next time Mr. Hoover talked to France he had to talk on a different key. When baffled and humiliated he had to prostrate himself at the feet of Premier Laval and ask him to leave the balances of France in New York because the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks and the international bankers and the New York bankers were headed for trouble through the loss of gold to the extent of $1,800,000,000, and perhaps more. It was then that the President of the United States did not appeal to the German international bankers who were then engaged in speculation in international exchanges, but it was then that he did appeal to the French Premier, Laval, to save him and his country from the sequences of his folly—the effects of the Hoover moratorium.

One hardly knows which is worse, the revolting dishonesty or the shocking bad taste. Do you wonder that his announcement of his plan created a sensation in France? As one of the French editors politely said:

The declaration of President Hoover is the most disconcerting impromptu diplomatic document imaginable. Leaving aside all sentimental considerations, it must be admitted that this rough brick hurled at Europe runs a strong risk of upsetting the whole edifice so laboriously erected by experts and governments for the parallel settlement of reparations and war debts. The American document was transmitted to our ambassador at Washington at the very time it was being made public like a simple harangue at a campaign rally.

After President Hoover had so unceremoniously informed Ambassador Claudel that he was at the moment giving out his plan, he is said to have telegraphed to Hindenburg, the President of Germany, begging him to telegraph him with the utmost haste a German request for a moratorium. We shall hear more of Hindenburg's telegram later on.

Simultaneously with this move on the part of their agent, Hoover, the German international bankers and others who followed their lead bought heavily in the stock exchanges and this buying caused stocks to rise in price. As the editor above mentioned expressed it—

A dose of very uncommon simplicity would be needed to cause one to believe that the Anglo-German American banks, which had been preadvised of the arrangements made at Washington, did not seize the opportunity to start a financial maneuver to take place on all the world financial markets in order to give a consecration of fact to the policy of the President, obliged to reckon with the susceptibilities of the American Congress.

At this point I wish to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a copy of the French reply to Hoover's proposal.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN (reading):

First. Repayment to France and other creditor nations within five years by Germany of the credits to be extended to the German economic system through the Bank for International Settlements. The original idea of the French Government had been to ask for the repayment within two years.

Second. Should Germany within five years enforce the moratorium as provided for under the Young plan, the guarantee fund which is provided for by the Young plan would not be paid out by France, but would be built up by making use of the untransferred unconditional annuity.

Third. Allocation of part of the credits created upon the basis of the untransferred, unconditional annuity to such European States as Yugoslavia and Greece, which might be stripped financially, owing to the suspension of payments of all intergovernmental debts, the net loss of Yugoslavia being about $16,000,000 and of Greece £700,000.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 15 additional minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I am sorry, but I have a connected statement which I want to complete. I would like to yield, but my time is limited.

Mr. STAFFORD. I see there is no trouble about the gentleman securing additional time, and I thought perhaps the gentleman would yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. If the gentleman will yield me more time to complete my address, I will then be only too glad to yield to the gentleman.

You will notice that the French in this reply expressly refused to give priority to private obligations. The bankers had endeavored to obtain this concession. President Hoover had tried to have the service on private obligations maintained. He wished to have the service on the Kreuger & Toll Swedish loan kept up. (Kreuger & Toll and the Swedish Match Trust are a Warburg outfit, but this is another chapter.) This the French refused to allow, and I call your attention to their statement that—

A formal assimilation has been established between the private debts of the Reich (Young loan and Kreuger loan) and the unconditional annuities not yet mobilized. To suspend the payment by Germany of the unconditional annuity while admitting that the Young loan placed with the public should continue to be served would go directly against a fundamental principle and express stipulations.

The Government considers, therefore, that a moral interest of the first order attaches to the fact that, even during the delay provided for by President Hoover, the payment of the unconditional annuity should not be in any way postponed.

The Germans do not wish to pay reparations. Nobody likes to pay a bill for damages.

The whole world knows what the Germans did in France. There are districts in France which will never be as they were before. I believe that the mass of the German people were willing to pay their indemnity as France paid her indemnity after the Franco-Prussian War, but something happened to Germany which prevented the full and free execution of her obligations. I will tell you what it was. After the World War Germany fell into the hands of German international bankers. Those bankers bought her and they now own her, lock, stock, and barrel. They have purchased her industries, they have mortgages on her soil, they control her production, they control all of her public utilities. There is no country in the world to-day of which the inhabitants are so enslaved as are the Germans.

The international German bankers have subsidized the present Government of Germany and they have also supplied every dollar of the money that Adolf Hitler has used in his lavish campaign to build up a threat to the government headed by Bruening. When Bruening fails to obey the orders of the German international bankers, Hitler is brought forth to scare the Germans into submission. The German international bankers have worked up great resentment in Germany, and their hired agents have prompted the Germans to unite in order to free themselves from their war obligations. But resentment, the bankers knew, was not enough. They had to put a weapon into the hands of Germany which could be used against the society of nations in general and against the United States in particular. They conceived the idea of robbing us by stealth, by fraud, and by trickery, and they have succeeded. Through the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks over thirty billions of American money over and above the German bonds that have been sold here has been pumped into Germany. When these Federal reserve loans began, Germany used to repay them. She established herself as a fairly good risk. Then her borrowings became larger and larger. You have all heard of the spending that has taken place in Germany. You have heard of her new modernistic dwelling houses, her great planetariums, her gymnasiums, her swimming pools, her fine public highways, her perfect factories. All this was done on our money. All this was given to Germany through the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks, and, what is worse, Federal reserve notes were issued for it.

A Federal reserve note is an obligation of the United States, and here you have a banking system which has financed Germany from start to finish with the Federal reserve notes and has unlawfully taken from the Government and the people of the United States. The Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks have pumped so many billions of dollars into Germany that they dare not name the total. I have repeatedly asked the Federal Reserve Board to send me a list of the acceptance credits granted by the accepting banks of this country by and with the consent of the Federal Reserve Board, and they have not. They can not and they dare not divulge the total. This is the Congress of the United States, but you have no information concerning the amount of Federal reserve currency that has been issued for the benefit of Germany on trade bills or acceptances. How, then, do you propose to proceed? Are you going to throw away our resources under the debt settlements we have with foreign nations in order to help Germany do that which is forbidden in the Constitution of the United States? Are you going to make this Government a defendant in a million suits for damages brought on American citizens, whose property you propose to throw away?

Do you know that Germany has been lending our money to Soviet Russia as fast as she could get it out of this country from the Federal Reserve Board and banks? Do you know that she is the author of the 5-year plan; that she has armed and supplied Soviet Russia with our money? Do you know that Germany and Soviet Russia are one in military and industrial matters? Do you know that Germany is well armed and that we paid for her rifles and uniforms, her commercial trucks which can be converted for military uses inside of 24 hours? She leads the world in aviation. Why not, when the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks have been secretly financing her for years. I challenge the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks to come in here and submit to an examination and an audit of their accounts. Do you know that the Federal Reserve Board and Federal reserve banks have also been financing Soviet Russia and that Russia owes her an immense sum, of which $150,000,000 is due by January 1, 1932, and that Russia has no money wherewith to pay it and will presumably be unable to pay it?

There are 9,000 German officers in the Russian Army. The Krupps are manufacturing war munitions in Moscow, and the manufacture is going on day and night. Thousands of armored trucks and tractors, currently used in Germany for commercial purposes, are convertible into war tanks within 60 hours. But the most important activities are in the fields of aviation and chemistry. The Germans and Russians are working unremittently on war gas and war flame in soviet-owned laboratories.

In addition to their debt to us, Soviet Russia has borrowed 535,000,000 reichsmarks from Germany, and that was our money, too. For the first nine months of this year Russian orders to German manufacturers amounted to 851,000,000 reichsmarks more than the entire amount Germany is legally bound to pay to France. These Russian orders, which, roughly speaking, amount to about $202,620,000, were for general machinery, tool machines, and electrical supplies. Do you not think that Germany is doing a handsome business on the free paper Federal reserve notes unlawfully given from this Government for her benefit?

You have been informed that there is an alternative before the United States—that Germany will pay her commercial obligations if we effect her release from the payment of reparations. I say that Germany will not pay her commercial obligations. I say that the Federal reserve banks have purchased and rediscounted false, worthless, fictitious, and uncollectible acceptances drawn in Germany, and that those false papers are in the vaults of the Federal reserve banks, in the vaults of the designated depositaries as security for money taken from the citizens of this country by taxation, and in other banks, and I say that they are worthless. It is a mere figure of speech to call them frozen assets. They are dead losses. The Government's money in the designated depositaries is gone, leaving nothing but this worthless paper behind it. The Hoover proposal has already cost us $1,500,000,000 in gold credit. How much more are we going to throw away? For my part, I say, "Not one cent." "Millions for defense, but not one cent for tribute."

We were called to the White House on October 6, and the President told us we were facing a national emergency. What was the emergency? It was a condition brought about by Herbert Hoover himself when he agreed to put this scheme across for the benefit of the international German bankers who control this country through the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks.

Last year there was some inquiry into the Federal Reserve Board and banks, and George L. Harrison, governor of the New York Federal Reserve Bank, was asked to state the amount of acceptances purchased by the Federal reserve banks in foreign countries. He was unwilling to answer in public. He was permitted to answer in secret. Why was that? It was because the Federal Reserve Board and banks are the duly appointed agents of the foreign central banks of issue and they are more concerned with their foreign customers than they are with the people of the United States. The only thing that is American about the Federal Reserve Board and banks is the money they use. The money is American but the contacts are European.

Who gave the Federal Reserve Board and banks the right to permit the German international bankers to loot this country and to take everything we had away from us? I say we will have an audit of these accounts and every Federal reserve bank and every director will be held liable for his acts in so far as he has been responsible for the exportation of American wealth to other countries and for the redistribution of wealth which has taken place in this country.

Do you think the stock-market collapse was accidental or, as some wiseacres say, that the American people changed their minds overnight? It was not accidental. It was a carefully contrived occurrence, and it was a part of this same Hoover moratorium which was the first move of the drive to cancel debts. The international bankers sought to bring about a condition of financial despair and anarchy here so that they might emerge as the rulers of us all, and the next step they hope to take with Hoover's assistance is the establishment of a new kind of war finance corporation under the control of the notorious short seller, Bernard Baruch, or another of the same stripe. Then you will see fascism here instead of the Constitution of the United States; then you will see a dictator controlling industry and production as we now have a dictatorship controlling money and credit. Do you want that to happen? No? Then you had better watch the manner in which you are being led by Mr. Hoover with his explanations as to where his leadership is taking you and the other people of this country.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 15 additional minutes.

Mr. McFADDEN. I thank the gentleman.

Now, let us consider the Young law, which this moratorium will break for the benefit of Germany. After the war came the treaty of Versailles. Whether it was good or bad is beside the point. It was Germany who asked for an armistice. It was Germany who was defeated. The treaty is what saved Germany. But was Germany completely honorable in her observance of that treaty? She was not. The world reechoed to her lamentations. Her propaganda kept up its work. When the Germans depreciated their currency they wiped out their internal debt. The losses in this country were enormous. So, too, were the losses in France.

At the present time the public debt of Germany is the least of the debts of the large European countries. By manipulation of her currency Germany freed herself of her internal debt. This is less than the other nations have to pay on their public debts. The other nations have already paid the internal public debt of Germany when they had their holdings of German currency wiped out by the manipulations of German bankers.

If Germany had sustained the burden of her own debt, as the Allies have done, and not obliterated it by inflation she would have had to raise 4,500,000,000 to 5,000,000,000 per annum in addition to her domestic expenditure. This would make it both just and practicable to add a provision in her budget which should bear some correspondence to the provision made in the Allies' budgets for their war expenditure.

Let us now consider the payments which are lawfully due from Germany under the Young law. Under this law Germany is required at the present time to pay a yearly annuity of 1,685,000,000 reichsmarks; of this amount France receives about half, or exactly 838,400,000 reichsmarks. This amount so payable to France divides into two classes: First, there is the conditional annual payment which amounts to 338,400,000 reichsmarks; secondly, there is the unconditional annual payment which amounts to 500,000,000 reichsmarks. The unconditional sum is subject to a heavy deduction for service of the amount already mobilized—Young bonds, and so forth. That amount is 44,500,000 reichsmarks. This leaves the unconditional amount for France at 455,500,000 only. Now, of this sum France has to take 80,000,000 reichsmarks and add it to the conditional amount in order to meet her payments to England and the United States. That leaves her an unconditional sum of 375,000,000 reichsmarks.

France receives no punitive damages under the Young law. The unconditional payments represent for France less than half of the interest on the sum she has had to expend for the reconstruction of the devastated regions. It seems not unreasonable, therefore, for the French to say that no arbiter and no court of international justice would tolerate such an indignity as the suppression or cancellation of these unconditional payments which are lawfully due to her. At this point I wish to insert in the RECORD a copy of Annex I of the Young plan.

ANNEX I

Exchange of declaration between the Belgian, British, French, Italian, and Japanese Governments on the one hand, and the German Government on the other.

The representatives of the Belgian, British, French, Italian, and Japanese Governments make the following declaration:

The new plan rests on the principle that the complete and final settlement of the reparation question is of common interest to all the countries which this question concerns, and that the plan requires the collaboration of all these countries. Without mutual good will and confidence the object of the plan would not be attained.

It is in this sense that the creditor Governments have, in The Hague agreement of January, 1930, accepted the solemn undertaking of the German Government to pay the annuities fixed in accordance with the provisions of the new plan as the guaranty for the fulfillment of the German Government's obligations. The creditor Governments are convinced that, even if the execution of the new plan should give rise to differences of opinion or difficulties, the procedures provided for by the plan itself would be sufficient to resolve them.

It is for this reason that The Hague agreement of January, 1930, provides that under the régime of the new plan the powers of the creditor powers shall be determined by the provisions of the plan.

There remains, however, a hypothesis outside the scope of the agreements signed to-day. The creditor governments are forced to consider it without thereby wishing to cast doubt on the intentions of the German Government. They regard it as indispensable to take account of the possibility that in the future a German government, in violation of the solemn obligation contained in The Hague agreement of January, 1930, might commit itself to actions revealing its determination to destroy the new plan.

It is the duty of the creditor governments to declare to the German Government that if such a case arose, imperiling the foundations of their common work, a new situation would be created in regard to which the creditor governments must, from the outset, formulate all the reservations to which they are rightfully entitled.

However, even on this extreme hypothesis, the creditor governments, in the interests of general peace, are prepared, before taking any action, to appeal to an international jurisdiction of incontestable authority to establish and appreciate the facts. The creditor power or powers which might regard themselves as concerned would therefore submit to the Permanent Court of International Justice the question whether the German Government had committed acts revealing its determination to destroy the new plan.

Germany should forthwith declare that, in the event of an affirmative decision by the court, she acknowledges that it is legitimate that in order to insure the fulfillment of the obligations of the debtor power resulting from the new plan, the creditor power or powers should resume their full liberty of action.

The creditor governments are convinced that such a hypothetical situation will never in fact arise, and they feel assured that the German Government shares this conviction. But they consider that they are bound in loyalty and by their duty to their respective countries to make the above declaration in case this hypothetical situation should arise.

The representatives of the German Government, on their side, make the following declaration:

The German Government takes note of the above declaration of the creditor governments whereby even if the execution of the new plan should give rise to differences of opinion or difficulties in regard to the fulfillment of the new plan, the procedures provided for in the plan would be sufficient to resolve them.

The German Government takes note accordingly that under the régime of the new plan the powers of the creditor powers will be determined in accordance with the provisions of the plan.

As regards the second part of the declaration and the hypothesis formulated in this declaration, the German Government regrets that such an eventuality, which for its part it regards as impossible, should be contemplated.

Neverthless, if one or more of the creditor powers refer to the Permanent Court of International Justice the question whether acts originating with the German Government reveal its determination to destroy the new plan, the German Government, in agreement with the creditor governments, accepts the proposal that the Permanent Court should decide the question, and declares that it acknowledges that it is legitimate, in the event of an affirmative decision by the court, that in order to insure the fulfillment of the financial obligations of the debtor power resulting from the new plan the creditor power or powers should resume their full liberty of action.

The French, German, and English texts of the present annex are equally authoritative.

As you see, under the Young law, the French, acting singly or with others of the following powers—that is, British, Belgian, Italian, Japanese—can appeal to the Permanent Court of International Justice, where, upon a showing that Germany had committed itself to actions revealing its determination to destroy the Young plan, the French and other nations would, by a decree in their favor, have full liberty of action restored to them. Of course, Germany was guilty of those actions by using the President of the United States as an agent instead of acting for herself, according to the procedure laid down in the Young law, which procedure was binding upon her. After the visit of Premier Laval to this country President Hoover agreed that whatever is done must take place within the structure and provisions of the Young law, consequently there is no use in hoping for the Hoover moratorium now. It is a dead letter. It will do nobody any good and it will do the United States a great deal of harm.

In discussing this matter in the French Parliament, Premier Laval said:

> But, given the nature of the engagements, freely accepted and quite recently subscribed to, of the Young plan, the solemnity with which the definitive and unalterable character of the unconditional annuities by which the necessary permanence of the principle of reparations is expressed was recognized, there would be great risk of upsetting confidence in the value of signatures and of contracts and thus to go against the end aimed at if, in the proposed suspension of payments, the unalterable annuity were treated like the conditional annuity.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has consumed one hour.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield additional time, but I would like to yield the gentleman one minute to ask a question.

Mr. McFADDEN. Before I do that, may I have the privilege of inserting these four additional pages in the RECORD to complete the statement I am making? I would also like to insert in the RECORD some extracts from the debates in the French House of Deputies covering this same subject.

Mr. PURNELL. Is the gentleman asking unanimous consent to do that?

Mr. GREENWOOD. No; I did not ask unanimous consent.

Mr. PURNELL. The gentleman is obliged to have unanimous consent, because under the rules of the House he is only entitled to one hour.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended one minute so that I may ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has been referring to a lot of papers here, and he has been asking himself or somebody in the front row whether or not he might insert them in the RECORD, and so far he has not asked the Chair or addressed the Chair for unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that. The Chair has propounded the question as to whether or not there is objection to an extension of his time one minute. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman is recognized for one additional minute.

Mr. BLANTON. How about the gentleman's request to insert these documents?

The CHAIRMAN. No such request has come to the Chair. A request for unanimous consent has come to the Chair from the gentleman from Indiana and that request has been placed before the committee and no objection has been offered. So the gentleman is recognized for one additional minute by the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD the matters I have just referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe anyone had a chance to object to the unanimous consent request. The Chair passed upon it so quickly, that no one had a chance.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman from Ohio desire to object?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard to the request.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the Chair had already decided that the gentleman was permitted to insert the matter referred to.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Did I understand the ruling of the Chair to be that there was objection?

The CHAIRMAN. There was objection to the extension of the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. BOYLAN. But the Chair had decided there was no objection. I think the RECORD will show that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated with respect to the proposal that, without objection, it was so ordered. The gentleman from Ohio immediately proceeded to object.

Mr. BOYLAN. I understood the Chair to make its decision before the gentleman objected, and I think the RECORD will show that proceeding.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated the proposition and said that without objection the application would be granted, and objection was then made.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Pennsylvania in the course of his remarks at intervals expressed a desire to enter as a part of his remarks certain documents that the gentleman referred to. The Chair, in response to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, stated that, without objection, it would be so ordered. At that time and as to those documents unanimous consent was granted. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] makes his objection at the end of the gentleman's speech, when he has asked unanimous consent to revise his remarks. He can not, by that objection, strike out of the gentleman's remarks the documents that he had put in by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Obviously, the last objection will not vitiate the unanimous consent heretofore granted to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BOYLAN. That is the very point I was making.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I understood the objection of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] to be to my unanimous-consent request and not to the request of the gentleman to insert certain documents in his speech.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. If the gentleman will permit, my objection was to the unanimous-consent request of the gentleman to extend the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. And there was no objection to the gentleman inserting any documents in his speech?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I do not know that that question has been put by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will then submit the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman withhold his objection a moment?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I will, for a moment, yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I seek this opportunity to call the attention of the Republican side of this House to the most extraordinary occurrence in this body to-day. If what the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] says about the "dishonesty" and the alleged treason of his President—and my President—be true, he has here to-day, on this floor, impeached the President of the United States, and articles of impeachment seem inevitable. [Applause.] These most serious charges against the Chief Executive are not made from any unimportant or irresponsible source. They are deliberately and vehemently uttered by one—a Republican—from the last-remaining citadel of the "party fit to rule"—Pennsylvania—and mark you! by one who for 10 years has been the chairman of the all-powerful Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives, the official mouthpiece of Presidents Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover on all banking questions, domestic and international. The "gods" have spoken! Hear them, ye! Oh, I sincerely hope that some Republicans will rise in their places to the defense of the President, because, Mr. Chairman, if they do not, mayhap, I shall do it. [Applause.]

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. There are demonstrations coming from the galleries.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will admonish the occupants of the gallery to refrain from expressions of approval or disapproval of what may be said or done on the floor of this chamber.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD].

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I had asked for time in order that I might present some thoughts to the House on a subject that I considered timely. But after the very tragic and remarkable address that has just been delivered to this committee of the House of Representatives, it occurs to me that no business is in order until either the brand of falsehood is put upon the extraordinary statements contained therein or the President of the United States be properly called to justice. [Applause.]

Such charges, Mr. Chairman, unless we have lost all of our sense of decency and honor, can not go unchallenged in this House. To attempt to treat them lightly or to gloss them over or lay them aside involves the honor of the United States and impeaches our own integrity. Of this there can be no doubt or question in the mind of any honorable person.

I have nothing but a kindly regard for the gentleman from Pennsylvania who has just left the floor. He has been my friend since I first came, for a short term, to the Congress of the United States nearly 15 years ago. However, it is not a question of friendship or lack of friendship to-day. There seems to run through my mind in connection with the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that verse of rebuke, "How sharper than a serpent's tooth is an ungrateful child," and that applies, it seems to me, whether the lurid statement be true or untrue, in view of the many honors conferred upon the gentleman by this side of the House. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to speak of the situation presented by his address for a little while. A part of it is known to me personally. I do not pretend to say that I have intimate knowledge concerning the entire field traversed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. But some of these things I do know. I regret that we are not more fully aware at this time how much of what he said was quotation from various sources and how much was his own statement.

I also know the law that applies to the situation, "That he who repeats a slander is equally guilty with him who conceived it." Yes; frequently under the law one who repeats a slanderous statement is more guilty than the originator of the slander.

I went into Germany with the army of occupation, and for many months I had charge of the civil affairs across the Rhine in the area we occupied, where I had an excellent opportunity to see and observe the conditions of these conquered people and their country.

I hold no brief for Germany. I have not abated the feeling that I had when I followed the flag during the war. I hold no brief for the President of the United States, but I want to defend the office of the Chief Executive of this Nation from the horrible and, in my opinion, unfounded, charge that has been made so unfortunately in this House this day against our President.

When we went into Germany shortly after the armistice I saw the people of that area, and I know the condition in which we found them. I know that a large part of the people of Germany were distressed, broken, and starving. I know that all of the meats and fats and things that were necessary to properly sustain life were gone. I need no man's information or story about that, because I know it myself from what I saw. I saw the little children of Germany with their arms and legs misshapen, looking as though they had been broken, because of malnutrition and the lack of proper food.

I did not know at the time what it was that caused this condition until it was explained that it was starvation. I think I have never seen a finer sight than these little ones coming to the mess of the American troops and securing food, or of some big doughboy walking down the street hand in hand with some of these hungry little children, feeding them a part of his rations as they walked along.

It is said that 800,000, mostly the old and the young, died in Germany from the lack of proper foods during the war.

Germany was exhausted financially and practically ruined at that time, as any man must know, if he will but think, and the only source from which Germany has since paid any considerable part of its indemnity or reparation to the United States or other nations is from borrowed money. She has been clever enough to borrow enough money from other countries to declare a dividend on what she owes. I am not defending this part of it. I merely call attention to the situation.

I do not know who inspired or wrote the speech delivered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN], but I hold in my hand a copy of the Washington Star of last evening—I am not sure about the date—in which appears an article by Adolph Hitler. In this article Mr. Hitler, so the heading says, "diagnoses the situation." Let me read you an extract therefrom showing a very comfortable and friendly feeling on the part of Hitler toward the gentleman who has just addressed the House.

This is Mr. Hitler's purported language as quoted by this newspaper:

> As a matter of fact the United States has already started to exercise an opinion of the present situation. I refer to the statement—

Then he named a gentleman in the other Chamber whom by the rules of this House I am forbidden to name—> and Represenative LOUIS T. McFADDEN.

That is the language of Adolph Hitler, when he comments upon the fact that the people of the United States are awaking. I know just as much about the situation in Germany from visits that I have made there since as does the gentleman who has addressed you. I know very well that his statement is unfounded, to speak as kindly as I can, trying to keep within parliamentary language, that the international bankers are financing Hitler. They have nothing in common with Hitler.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. I did not say that the international bankers were financing Hitler. I said that German industrials were financing him.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I would not willingly misquote the gentleman, and if that is the way he wants his remarks to stand, I withdraw mine. I would not do the gentleman an unkindness or injustice, or any other Member of the House, consciously. Does the gentleman mean by the industrialists those who work or those who conduct the factories?

Mr. McFADDEN. I mean German industry as it is organized to-day.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Be specific.

Mr. McFADDEN. It is a question of what I said.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. All right. Every gentleman can construe the matter for himself. I say that the statement that any substantial and responsible members of organized society in Germany are financing Adolph Hitler has no basis in fact whatsoever. [Applause on the Republican side.] In my judgment, it is not warranted, and, inoffensively speaking, I say it is not true. Let me tell you what will happen.

The gentleman declared that the international bankers would take control of Germany, or that Hitler would. I say to you that it will not be the international bankers who will take control of Germany, but that before spring comes it will be Hitler who will take over Germany, to the confusion of all the world, if the financial fabric of Germany breaks down. There is no doubt about that in my mind. Some gentlemen say, what do we care if that is so? Is there any man within the sound of my voice who is so unconcerned that he can quietly ask that question?

The gentleman was right in one respect, and I am in entire accord with him when he makes the statement that fraudulently, yes, wickedly, there have been placed in circulation for sale, and negotiated in this land, untold millions of German and other foreign bonds, bonds that no government ought to have permitted to be sold here; but I may also say, as long as we are on the subject, for I want to keep to the same line of thought, that these German and other foreign bonds are no worse than many of the mortgage bonds and securities of Stone & Co. and Straus & Co., Foreman & Co., and other bonds that have been sold in vast quantities in this country to the guardians and administrators and the small investors of the land, and thereby making difficult the financial situation of hundreds of thousands of our citizens.

But we have to address ourselves to this situation. Will you pardon me if again I say, and I say it most modestly, I am not a financier. I do happen to be the president of a bank. I do not profess to know much about banking, but I want to tell you that everyone will know what I am saying is true. We are past the period in this country where lack of confidence is taking the money from the tills and vaults of the banks. The banks that remain and are doing business are mostly the sound banks of the country, but there is a situation with reference to them that is startling. Do you know that the bonds and securities that constitute the liquid assets of banks are going down day by day, until there is danger to the banks of the country that comes from a depletion of the value of their assets, and which, apparently, no man is able to stop? Many of you know my statement is true. Let me make this remark to you, and I bespeak from you its serious consideration.

If these German and other foreign securities are to be still further reduced in value, until they are virtually worthless on the market, it is going to break the price of every security in every bank in the United States, and ruin or loss will come in many cases to the innocent depositor who has his money in many such institutions. You might as well squarely face that situation.

I do not want to say anything more about that at this time, as I want to get back to the main subject. As a lawyer, I think I can understand the counts of an indictment.

One of the counts in this indictment presented by the statements of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, is that the President of the United States has entered into direct negotiations with Germany and German interests, for the purpose of selling out the Government of the United States.

Let me use even stronger language than the gentleman did. If this was done by the President of the United States, he was a traitor to the American people. This is no time to mince matters. This is the time and place to speak plainly.

The gentleman also said that the President was the agent of the financial interests who were serving Germany, and which are opposed to the United States.

I do not care whether he said it by way of quotation or whether he said it as a direct charge.

He declared that there was an agency existing between the President of the United States and interest adverse to the United States. That is, the President was the agent of German financial interests. Very well. Let us follow it a step farther. An agent for every purpose within the scope of his authority is a principal, and the statement puts the President within the same category as a principal would be placed, as wickedly adverse to the United States.

I denounce all these statements as false and untrue, without offense to the gentleman; I denounce as false and untrue any statement that the President of the United States has negotiated directly with German financial interests. I denounce the statement that the President is the agent of any German financial interest which is adverse to the people of the United States.

The statement was also made that the President had sold out the United States.

What does that mean, my friends? By the ordinary construction of language, if there is a sale, there is also a price; and, if there is a price, the money that Judas took for the betrayal of Christ is no more foul that the money that would be taken under such circumstances by the President of the United States. I denounce as false and untrue the statement that the President has sold out the interest of the United States.

I do not know that I will claim the floor again. I have not claimed it in the past. But while I am on my feet let me say one word to both sides of the House, not in the attitude or the language that was used the other day—let me say it earnestly. I want you to remember, as I try to remember and as each of us tries to remember, that the honor and standing of the Congress of the United States is now at too low an ebb in the estimation of many people. I am not saying that we deserve it. I am saying that there is a widespread lack of confidence in the Congress of the United States. Men are apt to sneer at it and discuss lightly its honor and actions.

Ladies and gentlemen, if there is one particle of truth in the statement the gentleman has made, and if any integrity remains in us, let the gentleman be required to produce proof of his charges. Let him show that we have a President who is unworthy of occupying that high office, or let him go from this chamber as a foul traducer and assassin of the character of an honest man. [Applause.] These terrific accusations are too serious to lay aside. Let us not stop there.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman make the record clear that the charges of which he has just spoken were made by a Republican?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Does my friend suppose that the record does not already show that fact? I can not agree with you in view of what he has said, that he is any longer a Republican. His time came from the Democratic side of the House. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, let me conclude.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I will.

Mr. MAY. Not in an antagonizing way, but does the gentleman not think that if the German Government should meet its obligations in the payment of interest, it would tend to stabilize its bonds and securities?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I surely do.

Mr. MAY. Rather than depreciate them?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I surely do, and no man, it seems to me, can think otherwise. It is only a question of its ability to do so. If it has the financial ability, then the proposition of granting further delay is indefensible.

Mr. MAY. Does not the gentleman think that its failure to do it will tend to depreciate the value of its securities?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Yes; as a categorical answer, but let me go a little farther. I am not saying this offensively. These loans about which we are having so much trouble—not the loan to Germany, because it does not come as a public loan exactly—but virtually all of these loans were made by the Democratic administration of President Wilson. Had I then had a vote upon the proposition at that time I probably would have indorsed what was done. But these loans were recklessly and improvidently made and the difficulty comes now in attempting their collection.

If the President is seeking to give time for the payment of interest when interest can be paid without striking down the financial structure of Germany, then I would not agree with him. If, on the other hand, it is not possible to make collection without bringing about the collapse of the financial structure of Germany his action is well justified.

Let me conclude the sentence which I started a moment ago.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. It should be understood that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] all during the Hoover administration has been the Republican chairman of the great Committee on Banking and Currency of this House?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I will gladly incorporate that as a part of my remarks, if the gentleman so desires. I want him fully identified for, it seems to me, the horror of future generations, unless he can sustain the serious and outrageous charges which he has made against the President and his high office.

Now, Mr. Chairman, just one word further. I stated what the consequences should be to the gentleman. If the gentleman wants the House to believe what he states and if he is sincere, let him and his associates prepare articles of impeachment for presentation against the President of the United States, and let those articles of impeachment, if voted, be tried in the orderly way, and then the truth may be known, let the guilt and infamy and horror fall where it may. I merely say in conclusion that the President of the United States would ask for such action, knowing that the simple truth and a fair inquiry would fully vindicate him of these atrocious charges. If the statements made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania are not sustained by him, then he must bear the odium that attaches to one who falsely slanders and willfully assassinates character.

I thank you for your attention. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVENPORT]. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, I have recently come into the Chamber and have not heard the whole of the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I have caught the drift of it. It is a perverted interpretation of events relating to the German moratorium. The twisted nature of it will be clear to the country when the cogent statement before the Ways and Means Committee by Mr. Mills, of the Treasury, to which I have just been listening, is made public.

I was in Germany during the week that preceded the declaration of the moratorium. I spent most of that week with men well informed in the business and financial world of Berlin and with members of the Government, and I think this: That the situation in Germany as I saw it had gotten far beyond any question about international bankers. It was a question not even of starving people. It was a question of the slipping out from under a great nation of the whole economic and financial underpinning. The result in a very short time would have been the breaking down of the Bruening-Curtius government and the coming of Hitlerism into power. If a man like Bruening can not master the situation in Germany, a man like Hitler could not long control it, because while he is an able man, he is of a distinctly more emotional type and less intelligent than Bruening, and it would not be long before communism would have come in Germany. It was a situation like that which the President of the United States faced rather than any crisis of international bankers. It was a case of crumbling civilization in Europe.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield for a friendly question?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. Does the gentleman know that Curtius is being kept in office by the Socialists to-day and that the Socialists can not be accused of being friends of the international bankers?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Curtius is not now in office in Germany. Curtius was a strong man, but there was a party and political situation which made it better to put somebody in his place.

I am happy to come to the defense in this place of the President of the United States.

It is easy to dramatize a President like Theodore Roosevelt who, though a member of the Dutch Reformed Church, was essentially a fighting Methodist. It is not so easy to understand or appreciate a President who has the quieter psychology of a Quaker inheritance. It is another kind of power, equally effective and of great constructive importance in a period like this when quietness of spirit and thoughtfulness and practical ideas are worth more to the world than anything else.

We have come upon a time when there is far greater power in ideas than in arms, when brute force is failing throughout the world as a means of solving any major problem. In the month of June of this year Germany was on the verge of financial collapse, and collapse might soon have meant communism for Germany, further economic and political disaster in Europe, and greatly prolonged agricultural and industrial disorganization in the United States. Germany attained a breathing spell and at least a chance to find her way out, through the power of two ideas and nothing else—the idea of the debt holiday and the idea that by international agreement it might temporarily be determined what short-term loans Germany could safely pay and what she could not pay. There is at least a lessening menace of Hitlerism and communism in that country, and recent dispatches indicate that the German people are ready to develop their own forms of relief, by a sweeping emergency program of reduction in prices and rents and rates of interest as well as wages and by heavy penalties for those who send their capital out of Germany.

Those two ideas, which are giving Germany a chance, which are aiding in the settlement of Europe after a great tragedy, and which are thereby lessening the economic peril of America, are the product of the leadership of the President of the United States. And in that particular crisis, international dislocation and relations being what they are following the war, the President of the United States has been working for the people of the United States at every moment in the negotiations.

In what are esteemed more purely domestic concerns there is also overwhelming evidence of the quiet power of character in the Presidency and the leadership of unspectacular but effective ideas. In many other countries there have been revolution, disorder, national bankruptcy, artificial inflation, and panics on a wide scale; in America, none of these major evils. The serious manifestations of economic distress and inequality in the United States have been met by the people, as the President has met them, with quietness, with a sense of responsibility of all for each, with the assurance that Government would do everything that a government should do, with a tremendous fulfillment of private initiative and generosity, without strikes or disorders or other ineradicable marks of industrial conflict.

The President has sought the way out through practical, effective ideas which grow out of the experience of peoples and governments, including our own, in similar crises, and also through new ideas of constructive genius. The principle of maintaining wages wherever it can be reasonably done, the expediting of Federal construction and the inspiring of State and municipal public works, the sponsoring of the magnificent effort of Walter Gifford and his associates in preparing throughout America for the hard winter of unemployment; the attempt at stabilization of agricultural and commercial and home-loan finance in time of peril, the many practical suggestions of the presidential message—all these indicate leadership of a high and practical order. Instead of inflation, the setting free of the idle money in the private hoards and frozen banks and setting it to work for the Nation.

Instead of reaching blindly into the common treasury of the country for the purpose of the unintelligent distribution of a deficit, the setting to work of the vast resources of private initiative and generosity in America to accomplish the task. This is the statesmanship of ideas and not the politics of demagogy. It is a process of facing realities with high intelligence. The alleged sin of being an optimist about America at the onset of the catastrophe is one which may easily be forgiven. There is no reason for us to expect that any man, because we have elected him President of the United States, should become endowed by that election with supernatural powers of prophecy and vision to foresee and forfend a catastrophe beyond the range of human experience.

Yet, large numbers of the American people have an unhappy tendency to blame the pilot at the helm when the storm rages and dangers threaten. It is not a tendency to be encouraged in the Congress or the country. The year before Abraham Lincoln came up for election the second time, he was the subject of such bitter denunciation and attack that the confidence of large numbers of the American people was shaken, and no man of prominence could be found who predicted his reelection. A turn in the fortunes of war and the deep underlying sense of right in the breasts of the people reelected Lincoln. Wilson had a similar experience of public ill-will, and so had Washington.

We compare no man in American history with Lincoln, at least I do not. But every great and effective President who has sought with high intelligence and with all his soul to lead his people straight is entitled to the meed of gratitude and cheer. [Applause.]

This is not the President's depression nor any party's depression. If men go to war, they suffer the aftermath. If men kill each other and destroy each other's wealth, there is no escaping the penalty. If men inflate values and prices beyond all reason, there is a judgment day. It is not in the power of human ingenuity to escape it. The human race was engaged for four years in the most vicious of all wars, a war of populations and deliberate inflations of currency and credit to facilitate the war. We are now reaping the harvest. The sin of war and the sin of inordinate speculation after the war, and the sin of neglect of the economic security of the masses of the people are bringing their retribution upon the just and the unjust alike, as they did in the days of which Abraham Lincoln wrote in his second inaugural:

> Fondly do we hope, fervently do we pray, that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. Yet if God wills that it continue until all the wealth piled up by the bondsmen's 250 years of unrequited toil shall be sunk and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as it was written 3,000 years ago, so still it must be said, "The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether."

It is this background of world-wide economic and moral failure that we must hold in imagination when we estimate the burdens and the services to America and mankind of the present President of the United States. [Applause.] We have a right to be grateful that we have at the helm of the ship, in the gigantic storm which envelops the world, a pilot of quietness and of ideas, for it is only the leadership of balanced judgment and adventurous wisdom that is of any advantage to us now. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I regret to have to digress from the very interesting family discussion which has been in progress on the other side of the aisle, but in view of the attention that is being paid our international relations, I trust it will not be amiss to consider briefly a matter of domestic concern.

It is true the country is confronted by grave international questions, but it is also confronted by grave domestic questions. In fact, this Congress probably faces the most serious domestic situation ever faced by any Congress in time of peace. We are confronted by many intricate and perplexing questions, and by none more intricate or more perplexing or more important than our agricultural problem.

Twice Congress passed a bill—passed by an overwhelming majority in both Houses—a bill designed by the farm organizations of the Nation for the solution of this question, then in its incipiency. And twice the President vetoed the bill, while farm conditions grew steadily worse. Finally the President, in order to prevent the bill passing Congress a third time, devised a substitute which was press-agented throughout the country and on this floor as the ultimate solution of the whole question. And Congress, despairing of being permitted to formulate a bill of its own, reluctantly accepted it.

It was enacted as the agricultural marketing act, and as such it occupies a position unique in legislative annals. No other legislative measure ever failed so completely to achieve the purposes for which it was enacted as the agricultural marketing act.

Under the administration of the Federal Farm Board, which it created, the price of farm products has declined to the irreducible minimum; land values have shrunk almost to the vanishing point; and the purchasing power of the farm—the farm income—has declined so steadily that farmers are everywhere being dispossessed of their homes; business men and professional men dependent on farm patronage are being forced into bankruptcy at an appalling rate. Banks serving agricultural communities are failing in unprecedented numbers. And the condition of industry and labor, deprived of their greatest market, has precipitated a national crisis of unmeasured proportions, a crisis so portentous that the end can not be foreseen.

Whether the failure of the agricultural marketing act is due to inherent defects in the law itself or to the maladministration of the Federal Farm Board, charged with its enforcement, is a question which remains to be answered. But it must be answered. So acute is the situation and so insistent is the demand for an investigation which will answer this question that an official inquiry is inevitable. There is no alternative.

The demand for an investigation comes from both farm and factory. It comes from farm organizations, from the press, from the friends of the Farm Board, and, I trust, from the Farm Board itself.

It is not a partisan matter. It is not a political issue. It is an economic and a legislative proposition and should be approached as such. It is a subject for calm, dispassionate, impartial, judicial determination.

The country wants to know—and the Congress must know—whether these conditions arise from inadequacy of the law, from incompetency of the board, or from causes which legislation, or agencies created by legislation, are powerless to affect. Upon the accurate determination of this question rests not only the future course of agricultural legislation but of legislation for the alleviation of practically every economic evil of the day. The rehabilitation of the country, the recovery from the depression, the return to prosperity must start with the farm. The buying power of the farm must be restored. Until it is restored there can be no permanent market for the products of labor or industry. An open, honest, complete investigation of the entire subject is imperative and merits the interest and cooperation of everyone.

With that in view, let us examine briefly the charges which have brought about the demand for an investigation of the administration of the Federal Farm Board. They relate to practically every activity in which the board has engaged.

1. It is charged that the board is carrying an overhead out of proportion to its requirements; that it is overstaffed; that it is paying salaries in excess of those paid for similar services in other departments and in private business; and that the employees of the Stabilization Corporation and Farmers Grain Corporation, in particular, are receiving compensation materially higher than that received prior to their employment by the board.

2. It is charged that the cost of the board's stabilization program has been exhorbitant, especially in prices paid for the business, good will, and physical properties of firms and corporations and in unnecessary shipment and storage and reshipment and restorage of commodities.

3. It is charged that the board has organized and established stabilization corporations and subsidiaries when it could have utilized the services of existing cooperative organizations which would have better served the purpose of the act under which the board was operating.

4. It is charged that unjust discrimination has been exercised by the board in making loans and in advancing credits, and that cooperative organizations have been, for irrelevant reasons, denied credit to which they were entitled under the law.

5. It is charged that the board has exercised undue control over organizations accepting loans and has exacted compliance with requirements unwarranted by the intent of the law.

6. It is charged that the board has sought to supplant and destroy farmer-owned cooperative agencies in existence at the time the board was organized and that it has used Federal resources at its command to drive existing cooperatives out of business, retarding the development of the cooperative movement the act was intended to foster.

7. It is charged that the board has failed to cooperate with other branches of the Government in that it has financed industries in unlawful operations and has continued to finance them after a Federal court has held such operations to be illegal.

8. It is charged that stabilization corporations, with the knowledge and approval of the board, have been operated in violation of the law under which they were chartered, with particular reference to amounts of commodities purchased from their members and amounts purchased from others.

9. It is charged that the board has attempted to influence elections and has expended large amounts in publicity intended to affect public sentiment.

10. It is charged that the board failed to cooperate fully in urgent drought-relief work in that it permitted charges against grain handled in that connection which the situation did not warrant.

11. It is charged that unwarranted purchases of commodities and contracts for options on the Chicago Board of Trade and other exchanges were made by the board and were continued when it was apparent that heavy losses incident to such operation were inevitable.

12. It is charged that stabilization operations in basic commodities were delayed by the board until all but a negligible amount of the year's crops had left the farm and that such stabilization operations were then discontinued before the next year's crops were ready for market.

13. It is charged that large quantities of commodities were thrown on the market by the board at harvest time and the price forced down just as farmers were marketing their crops.

14. It is charged that discrimination against domestic consumers and in favor of foreign consumers was practiced by the board in the sale of commodities by granting to foreign buyers advantageous terms of sale which were refused buyers for home distribution.

15. It is charged that the board has depressed the price of farm products by refusing to make public the amount and extent of their operations and by permitting exaggerated estimates of their holdings to gain currency, and that they have declined to make public the total cost in brokerage, commissions, interest, insurance, transportation, processing, and storage of commodities held by its stabilization corporations.

There are other charges, but those itemized are of such a nature and have gained such wide circulation as to warrant the fullest investigation. If they are without foundation, the sooner they are discredited the sooner will the Farm Board have the unqualified confidence and support of the public. If they are sustained, the sooner the remedy can be applied. In either event, the way will be cleared for the accurate and effective solution of a problem which must be solved before remedial legislation can be enacted. The courts have held since the adjournment of the last session that the power of investigation is properly exercised by Congress preliminary to the formulation of appropriate legislation. When a great disaster occurs within the jurisdiction of either the Navy or the Army, a court of inquiry is at once assembled to determine the causes and to deduce facts to assist in preventing recurrence of the catastrophe. Certainly in the face of a catastrophe which has beggared our greatest industry and has wiped out billions of national assets, the only course which can be consistently followed is to require an investigation to inquire minutely into the disaster and its causes, and to endeavor to provide against further losses and to insure an early return to normal conditions.

I am certain the members of the Federal Farm Board will welcome such an inquiry. The charges brought against them collectively and individually are of too serious a nature to be passed over, even if no weightier issues were involved. They should have the fullest vindication, or else responsibility should be placed where it properly belongs. It is a matter which does not admit of temporization or compromise.

And for the same reason the investigation should be made by a special committee. Many members of the great Committee on Agriculture—and it is one of the greatest committees of the House—assisted in reporting the bill when it came up for consideration. To that extent it is their own handiwork. And to the same extent the Farm Board is their protégé. It follows that they should not wish to be embarrassed by being called to pass on questions which this investigation raises. Under our court procedure no tribunal sits upon a case in which there is any personal interest. And this investigation should not be made an exception.

Personally, I am convinced that every member of the committee is not only competent to pass on all questions which would be raised in such an inquiry but that the committee would discharge the duties of the investigation fairly and efficiently and perhaps more effectively than any other committee that could be appointed. However, in justice to them they should not be required to undertake it. Every care should be taken to anticipate criticism, every precaution should be observed to obviate any charge that the investigation is being whitewashed. If we are to pass the economic crisis in which we find ourselves, if we are to end this depression, we must restore confidence. That is the first step. We must have the confidence and cooperation of the public and we can not afford to omit any precautions which will insure fairness and justice in a matter of such vital and immediate importance, and in which there is such universal interest. It is to be hoped that the Committee on Rules, to which the resolution has been referred, will accord it an early hearing.

The resolution is appended:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, directed to appoint from the membership of this House a select committee of nine members, which said committee is hereby authorized to fully investigate all operations, activities, and proceedings of the Federal Farm Board since its establishment, including the activities and transactions of all its subsidiary corporations and organizations and its relations, communications, and transactions with all cooperative organizations and other marketing agencies and associations.

Resolved further, That said committee is also hereby authorized and empowered to appoint such subcommittees as it may deem advisable, and the said committee or any subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized to sit during the sessions of the House or during any recess of the House, and to hold its sessions in such places as the committee may determine; to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of witnesses, the production of books, papers, and documents, to administer oaths and affirmations, and to take testimony.

Resolved further, That the Speaker is hereby authorized to issue subpœnas to witnesses upon the request of the committee or any subcommittee thereof at any time, including any recess of Congress; and the Sergeant at Arms is hereby empowered and directed to serve all subpœnas and other processes put into his hands by said committee or any subcommittee thereof.

Resolved further, That said select committee shall have the right at any time to report to the House in one or more reports the results of its inquiries with such recommendations as it may deem advisable.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LOZIER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the President's message and had come to no resolution thereon.

THE FEDERAL FARM BOARD

Mr. WELCH of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a 2-page statement in the form of an address on the San Francisco Grain Trade Association of the Chamber of Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WELCH of California. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following:

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., November 18, 1931.

The San Francisco Grain Trade Association has been opposed to several basic purposes of the agricultural marketing act which became effective on June 15, 1929, ever since the act was formulated.

The association maintains that the country-wide set-up of the grain trade forms a vast economic machine whereby the Nation's grain and cereal crops are marketed in a most efficient and economical manner—and with the full benefit of competitive buying for the producer's advantage—and that no power of Government can improve on the present system for the benefit of agriculture.

The association also maintains that a careful study of the cooperative movement will disclose the fact that most of such organizations have functioned well only in times of normal or short crops, failing utterly in times of surpluses.

The association believes that the speculative element incidental to trading in grain is a valuable aid to the stabilization of grain prices in its final analysis, and therefore opposes the feature of the act which contemplates minimizing speculation.

The association decries the attempt of the Government to prevent and control surpluses, maintaining the absurdity of such efforts, at least in a democratic country. Nature's great economic forces must prevail in a land where individual initiative and effort are not controlled, and history clearly demonstrates that governmental interference in such issues has always been detrimental rather than beneficial to the interests it sought to aid.

The association now comes forward with a most earnest protest against a situation which has been developed in California during the current year, and joins the grain trade of the country in its endeavors to advise Congress and the American people of an intolerable condition which has emanated from the activities of the Federal Farm Board, made possible under the agricultural marketing act.

The Farmers' National Grain Corporation was organized under the laws of the State of Delaware in August, 1930. Its avowed purpose is to market grain for farmers' cooperative organizations throughout the several States. It is supposed to be farmer owned and farmer controlled, but the Farm Board approves its by-laws, dictates its policies, and approves the appointment of its managers. George S. Milnor, president of the Farm Board's Stabilization Corporation, is vice president and general manager of the Farmers' National. His salary for his joint office is said to be $50,000 per annum. The operations of the Grain Stabilization Corporation are secret; it openly declines to make public its plans for the disposal of its vast wheat holdings. But the Farmers' National can not but know these plans and thereby has an unwarranted knowledge of the eventual trend of the market, from which knowledge great profits for the corporation and certain individuals can be taken.

The Farmers' National, capitalized at about $500,000, with but little over $50,000 paid in as cash capital, has been financed by the Farm Board to the extent of over $20,000,000. During its first year of operations in buying and selling for the Stabilization Corporation and in transacting other business, it earned over $600,000 net, none of which will be redistributed amongst the agriculturists of California.

Very briefly, the officials of the Farmers' National Grain Corporation, who are said to hold the stock control in the company, are quietly building up a strong and widely operated structure, with offices located at strategic points, warehouses, elevators, branches, and other collateral advantages, all with Government money, against the day when Government support will be withdrawn—as all concede it eventually must—at which time they will be firmly intrenched in the grain business throughout the country, and with ample capital but not of their own providing. This all-important matter of capital deserves careful consideration. The Farmers' National has been both buying and selling large quantities of grain for account of the Grain Stabilization Corporation, receiving a liberal commission for both operations. Commissions are also paid on Government loans extended to cooperatives through the Farmers' National. Large earnings have also accrued from the high rates of commission (which they term "operating charges") which are paid the Farmers' National by the cooperatives affiliated with it.

To all the above the grain trade of the United States is now voicing violent protest, in which the San Francisco association joins. But in California conditions are somewhat different and unique in that the basic intent of the agricultural marketing act is to serve agriculture through cooperative organizations, while in this State we have the Farmers' National Grain Corporation, operating neither for nor with any California cooperative, rapidly becoming a dominant factor in the State's grain business to the dismay of private business interests and to the consternation and loss of our agriculturists. And its letterhead carries the bold caption "Cooperating with the Federal Farm Board." Already it has purchased eight country grain warehouses from former operators and has leased three others—all in the San Joaquin Valley.

California produces considerable wheat but not enough for its own needs. Shortly before the Farm Board's sale of wheat to China the Farmers' National sent its agents throughout the State and purchased practically all the wheat then remaining in farmers' hands. The market immediately advanced. The profits on this deal will accrue to the Farmers' National Grain Corporation, and our agriculturalists will in no way benefit. The wheat farmers of our State are greatly incensed at this act.

Last spring when it was apparent that California would have a short grain crop the Farmers' National bought up a large portion of the old crop of barley then remaining in the interior of the State at low prices. The market then advanced materially, but no profits were distributed to any California farmers.

Our State produces about 750,000 tons of barley annually. About one-third of this is a surplus crop and is shipped to Europe for brewing purposes, chiefly to Great Britain. The British importers keep closely in touch with conditions in this market. They all seem to hold a strong prejudice against Government-pooled or Government-financed grain, and now we have the warning from many of them that they may seek their supplies in other markets if the Farm Board control or aid continues with our California product. They even show their prejudice against the pooled grain in their own Provinces of Canada and Australia, so we can not consider their warning as an idle threat.

Barley is a world crop. England produces about 1,000,000 tons of this type of grain annually. She does not have to buy the California surplus—for excellent beer is made in Germany which uses none of our State's barley. So the loss of our export barley trade is at issue—and as there are many hundred of thousands of acres in California that will produce nothing else profitably at the present time, and as there is no other market for our surplus, there is no denying the fact that we are facing a most threatening situation.

The California farmer has at all times enjoyed the advantage accruing from competitive buying. The activity of the State's grain trade in vying with one another in securing the better types of brewing barley for the British trade has kept prices up to very satisfactory levels for many years. Should the Farmers' National gain a dominant position in the barley trade in this State, it could readily keep prices down to satisfy the British importer, to the end that the corporation and the foreign buyer would profit and the farmer suffer. The grain dealer would quite naturally fade from the picture.

So our association strongly maintains that the agricultural marketing act should be repealed or at least greatly modified. The Government should get out of business, but in spite of the oft-repeated sentiments of President Hoover to the effect that no Government agency should engage in price fixing of products lest bureaucracy succeed democracy; that initiative must not be undermined; that the intrusion of Government into trading operations will raise a host of new dangers; that the interference with normal processes of supply and demand will threaten the sane progress of the world; yet the Government through its Federal Farm Board has done all these things and more.

We know that grain growing in California has been benefited in no way by the Farm Board or the Farmers' National Grain Corporation; we also know that unbearable hardships are being imposed on business enterprises unable to maintain their position against discriminatory competition from the Government; hence our plea to the California delegation in the Congress of the United States that justice be done forthwith.

SAN FRANCISCO GRAIN TRADE ASSOCIATION,
By F. A. SOMERS, President.

STABILIZATION OF EMPLOYMENT

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an address made by me to the Grand Aerie of the Fraternal Order of Eagles at Toledo, Ohio, on the 12th of last August.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, the Fraternal Order of Eagles, which is a great humanitarian organization, with a brilliant record of service and devotion to the common men and women of America, has prepared and presented for the consideration of the Congress a bill for the stabilization of employment. The purpose of this bill is to set up governmental machinery that will keep industry on an even keel and ward off such evil cycles of unemployment and attendant woes as the one through which we are now passing. In proposing this measure the Fraternal Order of Eagles has exhibited creative resourcefulness, high courage, and far-reaching vision. Splendid as is the order's record of humanitarianism this measure is the capsheaf of its service to humanity.

Reforms like this progress slowly. The bill was first introduced in the Congress by me on December 1, 1930. In the Seventy-first Congress it advanced to a hearing before the House Judiciary Committee when the merits of the proposal were ably presented by Frank E. Hering of South Bend, Ind., Conrad H. Mann of Kansas City, Representative CLYDE KELLY, of Pennsylvania, and others. Members of the committee saw in the suggestion much merit but the time was altogether too brief to secure action before the close of the short session on March 4, last. By request of the order I reintroduced the bill in the Seventy-second Congress on the 10th day of the present month and it is now pending before the Judiciary Committee of the House.

When the grand aerie, or national body, of the order assembled at Toledo last August this measure was a foremost topic of discussion. By special invitation I appeared before the grand aerie on August 12 and spoke on the measure. By courtesy of the House of Representatives the address I delivered on that occasion is herewith printed in full, as follows:

Grand Worthy President and members of the Fraternal Order of Eagles assembled from all of the States of the Union:

How to prevent recurrent periods of industrial prostration and unemployment is the greatest problem of our age. It is a challenge to the best there is in American statesmanship. We are passing through appalling times. Over 5,000,000 willing workers are out of work in our country. This unemployment has cut off the sustaining income of 20,000,000 people, or one-sixth of our entire population. The incomes of countless thousands of firms have shrunk until their business operations are being written "in the red." Investments have evaporated or dwindled in value until financial princes have become paupers and widows who invested all they had in supposedly perfect securities find themselves without a cent of income. Agriculture, no less than industry, is in the grip of creeping paralysis. Farms everywhere are for sale at less than their appraised value. Farm property is going to rack and ruin because our farmers can not pay their mounting taxes, let alone raise funds necessary to make improvements.

My Washington home is two blocks up Pennsylvania Avenue from the White House. I am an early riser, retaining the habits I formed in my adolescent youth on the farm. Every morning I ride down to my office in the House Office Building on a street car and these are the sights that successively greet my eyes: First, the White House, where abides the well-meaning President of the United States, the first citizen of this great sovereign Commonwealth of free men; second, the Treasury of the United States, money center of the world; third, the bank where Abraham Lincoln had his account, a Gibraltar of finance, its vaults bulging with money; fourth, the oldest national bank in Washington, 116 years old and with enormous resources; fifth, the home of the largest trust company in Washington, with great steel vaults that hold and protect the treasures of the rich; sixth, another strong national bank named for the first Postmaster General of the United States, Benjamin Franklin; and last but not least, on the matutinal vista a long bread line at Sixth Street with a queue extending a square and a half, whose hungry component units march forward in order under the direction of sharp-eyed policemen, and, turning with perfect military alignment and precision, enter a ground floor room in the abandoned old National Hotel to receive the morning hand-out of bread and hot coffee. Henry Clay died in that hotel and sometimes when I pause to watch the column of hungry men advance I wonder whether he is looking back across the Elysian fields and getting an eye full. If he is looking back at all he is getting an eye full, because the National Capital is a city that is supposed to be independent of the fluctuations and depressions of business. There the Government as regularly as clockwork pours out millions to meet its pay rolls, which outflow always heretofore has been regarded as a guaranty of local prosperity. Although I have been a member of the Washington press gallery for 30 years I never until during the last year saw a bread line at the Nation's Capital.

While this is going on at the Capital of our Nation countless thousands of American citizens throughout the country, clean, upright men and women, are being forced to humiliate themselves by accepting alms and the community chests and welfare associations everywhere find their funds prematurely exhausted. It is no reflection on these good people that they are compelled by the thousands to bend their pride and receive largess from the hand of charity—something they had never dreamed would be possible. The blame rightfully belongs on society and especially on our statesmen who through lack of foresight or indifference, or both, have neglected to establish machinery to stabilize industry and employment.

With matchless leadership and clear vision the Fraternal Order of Eagles is proposing a plan which when it is carried into effect will save America's millions of working men, business men, farmers, and investors from these recurrent cycles of depression and all their attendant woes. Heretofore we have taken it for granted that these debacles are inevitable. When we emerged from one we lived in fool's paradise of unstable prosperity until the cycle turned and we again went down into the bottom of the trough. We have assumed that we had to do this, as a matter of course—that when soup-house time comes we must have soup houses, just as when night comes we must have darkness. Soup houses and unemployment have been regarded by us in our short-sightedness as part of a natural and inexorable régime that was as fixed and permanent as the planets in their orbits.

In June a year ago a brilliant son of Indiana and a great leader of men arose to challenge the truth of these conclusions. That man was Frank E. Hering, of South Bend, Ind., past grand worthy president of our order, a former professor of economics, a thinker, and above all a humanitarian of the first rank. Arising in the State aerie at Anderson, Ind., he proposed a plan for governmental machinery in the form of a commission to stabilize industry, agriculture, and commerce. His plan was so simple, so workable, so practical that it was indorsed enthusiastically by the State aerie and later in the year was adopted unanimously and with tremendous acclaim by the grand aerie, meeting in San Francisco. A commission was created to whip the proposal into shape, at whose head was placed that great Eagle and that great humanitarian, Conrad H. Mann, of Kansas City. On the commission as coworkers with Mr. Mann were chosen men of the highest intelligence and character—Otto P. Deluse, of Indiana, Ex-Congressman John M. Morin of Pennsylvania, and United States Senator JOHN J. BLAINE, of Wisconsin. This plan was written into the form of a bill which was introduced at the last congress by Senator BLAINE in the Senate and by myself in the House. On December 17 last we had a hearing on the bill before the House Committee on the Judiciary. I wish all of you—I wish every person in the United States—could have been present on that most impressive occasion. For an hour and a quarter the members of the committee listened with rapt attention to Mr. Hering as he explained the practical workability of the Eagles' plan, in language so clear, concise, and illuminating that the committee would have been glad to have listened to him all day if the program of the House had permitted. He was at his best and he carried the unflagging interest of the committee with him from start to finish.

The Eagles' plan provides for the creation of machinery that will be the greatest stabilizing influence in the world, doing for the Nation at large and for industry, employment, commerce, and agriculture, what certain governmental instrumentalities now successfully do for interests and special groups as, for instance, the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has saved many a railroad from being wrecked, and the Federal reserve system, which has been a great help in fostering and stabilizing the banking of the country. The Eagles' plan for a stabilizing commission goes far beyond anything that has ever been attempted in the direction of erecting a governmental structure that will keep industry and business on an even keel and ward off unemployment. Now and then governmental bureaus and agencies have pecked at this field of service but their efforts have been sporadic, amateurish, and wholly ineffective. Under the Eagles' plan there will be established for the first time a competent governmental agency in the form of a commission of five members that will meet continuously and give its entire time to working out plans to stabilize industry and employment. Its activities will never cease and it will deal with the subject in a very fundamental way. As all of the world is interrelated in an economic sense, all of the world will be embraced in the scope of the commission's investigations, for it often happens that factors arise in other countries that have a direct economic reaction in the United States. For instance, England's advocacy of the gold standard in India immediately dislocated the market for silver in the United States, China, Japan, and Mexico. If the Eagles' stabilizing commission had been in existence then it would have learned in advance of the factors at work in India and by taking the appropriate steps would have softened the effects of the debasement of silver so they would hardly have been felt in America.

The Eagles' commission when in operation will be a sort of general headquarters where conditions both here and abroad will undergo continual analysis by experts who understand their business and where plans of great variety will be formulated to steer our people clear of disaster. If one industry is threatened with dullness the workers in that industry will be advised where they can secure employment in another industry. If there is a surplus in sight of one crop the farmers of the country will be advised so they can turn their attention to another crop of which there is no surplus, all to the end of maintaining profitable prices. It is very properly provided that the commission shall have no authority in itself to compel obedience or even to issue orders of any kind. Its function is to be that of an adviser to Congress. It will be a great fact-finding agency and will work out carefully measured policies and programs which it will present to Congress and in that broad field of service it will become when in full operation the most comforting and helpful influence in our national life.

The Eagles' stabilizing commission has not yet arrived, but I am here to report to you that it is on the way! Its accomplishment will mark the very peak of achievement in a practical realization of the brotherhood of man, which is the hope and the objective of our splendid order. To say that these distressing cycles of depression and unemployment are natural and can not be prevented is fool's talk. To say that we who are in Congress, charged with promoting the general welfare, can not visualize the value of the plan offered to us by this great fraternal order and adopt means to ward off these unnecessary debacles is a reflection on the brains that God gave us. To say that in a great organized society there is not ability enough to arrange economic values so as to meet anticipated economic wants is a sad commentary on our public men. Of course it is a practical proposal. Of course it will succeed ultimately, and the Eagles' plan or some one fashioned after it will be adopted, and when that happy day comes the credit will belong to the great fraternal order that we all love.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House on January 4 next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, for one hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House on January 4 next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, for one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is that going to be the policy this year to allow a Member one hour on a certain day, three or four weeks in advance? There was considerable discussion of that last year, and we thought it was a bad policy. But it is for the majority to make its plans, and I am not going to object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that he does not believe in that policy, and has so expressed himself a number of times. The Chair now takes the liberty of saying as a Member of the House that he believes that that policy is a mistake, and that gentlemen desiring to address the House ought to avail themselves, as far as possible, of the Committee of the Whole for that purpose. Otherwise the business of the House is clogged, and it interferes very often with the procedure that it is desired to pursue on that advanced day by virtue of the fact that consent has been given a Member to address the House at that time.

Mr. SNELL. I think it is a bad policy.

Mr. RAINEY. May I suggest to the gentleman from New York that he make his request immediately before the adjournment for the holidays?

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, in deference to the wishes of the Chair, I withdraw my request. I presented it to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL], and had their consent; but I am willing to withdraw the request.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken to-day be permitted to extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Reserving the right to object, I do not know whether the Chair has the information, but I would like to inquire whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] had leave to extend his remarks?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not informed.

A MEMBER. He did not.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am forced to object to that particular instance.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RAINEY. I desire to state that if the Mapes committee is not ready to go on to-morrow with their bills we will go into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the President's message. Next Monday or Tuesday it is not the purpose to take up anything of a controversial nature. There are many demands for time and we can devote those days to more debate. We expect to get the moratorium up on Thursday and perhaps get a vote on Friday.

PERSONAL REQUEST

Mr. WEAVER, at the request of Mr. DOUGHTON, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for one week on account of death in the family.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, December 16, 1931, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

268. A letter from the Comptroller of the Currency, transmitting annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency covering the activities of the Currency Bureau for the year ended October 31, 1931; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

269. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a draft of a bill that the act of Congress entitled "An act to repeal and reenact chapter 100, 1914, Public No. 108, to provide for the restoration of Fort McHenry, in the State of Maryland, and its permanent preservation as a national park and perpetual national memorial shrine as the birthplace of the immortal Star-Spangled Banner, written by Francis Scott Key"; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

270. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting annual report of the Commissioner of Narcotics for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1931; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1931

Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., pastor of Foundry Methodist Episcopal Church, city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, our fathers trusted in Thee and were not confounded; in Thee we trust. We would hush the beating of our own hearts that we may hear the beating of Thy mighty heart in the storm and tumult of these perplexing days.

Grant us courage, grant us wisdom for the facing of this hour and for the living of these days. Solemnize us with the responsibility of ability, save us from spinelessly melting into our surroundings. Teach us the glory of the loneliness that comes of following the highest we know and the noblest we can dream. Above all other loyalties and fealties may our ruling passion be to do justly and love mercy and walk humbly before our God.

Through all the maddening maze of these times that are trying men's souls, lead us to a collective life for humanity, just and merciful and full of joy. Give to us eyes that are clear enough and hearts that are big enough for those social reconstructions, for those daring brotherly feats of generous good will that will yet turn human life into a glad, gracious, triumphant fraternity all around this worn and weary world. With contrite hearts we seek the kindly light that will still lead us on if we follow patiently and obediently.

We ask this in the holy name of the Prince of Peace, of whom once more with gladdened hearts we hear Christmas angels proclaiming that the government shall be upon his shoulder. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. MCNARY and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a telegram signed by Francis Chapman, president Local No. 46, National Federation of Federal Employees, of Arkansas City, Kans., protesting on behalf of the federation against the proposal to lower the salaries or wages of Federal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts presented a petition signed by Alton C. Taylor and 108 other citizens of the State of Massachusetts praying for the passage of legislation to prohibit the shipment of foreign lobsters into United States markets, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial signed by members of the faculty and students of Smith College, Mass., remonstrating against the alleged unwarranted measures employed by officials of Harlan County, Ky., to "break" the coal strike and miners' unions in that region, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. KING presented a cablegram from Isauro Gabaldon and others on behalf of the Philippine Civic Union, Manila, P. I., embodying a resolution adopted by that assembly condemning any tentative solution of the Philippine problem other than immediate complete and absolute independence, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

He also presented the following cablegram from Aguilar Pimentel, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MANILA, P. I., September 24, 1931.

Commissioners GUEVARA and OSIAS,
Washington, D. C.:

Houses legislature approved in joint session to-day following memorial for President and Congress:

We, the members of the Philippine Legislature, in joint session assembled for ourselves and in behalf of the Filipino people, do hereby reiterate our petition for the immediate and complete political separation of the Philippine Islands from the United States. Our desire for liberty was repeatedly manifested in the course of our history throughout our many struggles for political emancipation, culminating in the establishment of the Philippine Republic. We lost our independence because of the superior force of America. We expect to regain it because of her plighted word. We acquiesced in American rule only when we were assured that she came not as a conqueror but as a liberator. In all good faith we relied on her promise made through her highest executive officials and confirmed by the Congress of the United States when it declared that the independence of the Philippine Islands shall be granted upon the establishment of a stable government. This condition having been fulfilled, the Filipino people rightfully expect that their independence will be recognized without any further delay. Practical considerations also justify this urgent desire for immediate separation.

The present movement to exclude Filipinos from the United States is giving rise to friction and misunderstanding. The manner in which the campaign is being conducted can not but arouse among the Filipino people a feeling that it is impelled by other than purely economic motives. Then, at the present time it is not safe for Filipinos in some parts of the United States to engage in lawful occupation. So long as we remain under the American flag, justice demands that we shall be allowed freely to live, work, and travel in any American territory.

The dual responsibility in our government, the one assumed by the Governor General and the other by Filipino officials, has been the source of serious conflicts in the past, and is ever fraught with difficulties. Such an unsatisfactory situation must end. A backward step is unthinkable. The only solution is independence.

Our present trade relations with the United States are uncertain and unstable, regulated exclusively by the American Congress. America's interests rather than our own are the dominant consideration. There is an increasing demand by American producers to maintain the American market solely for their benefit. Powerful American interests are now conducting a persistent campaign against the free entry of Philippine products. No one knows how long the American market will remain open to us. Doubts and misgivings have seized upon the minds of Philippine producers and investors, thus checking our development. We believe that enduring economic progress can only be achieved under an independent Philippines, free to dictate its own policies.

These facts prove the wisdom of the declared purpose of the United States to grant us independence. They also serve to strengthen our belief that political separation is the only solution to our problem. We see no other alternative. The happiness and prosperity of the Philippines and the economic interests of America are not to be found in the present artificial union, which hampers our national development and injures economic progress, but in political separation, wherein each may live the life suited to its distinct individuality and its national interests. The independence of America from the Philippines would seem to be as imperative as the independence of the Philippines from America.

Therefore, with all due respects, with a deep feeling of gratitude to America, and with full consciousness of the burdens and responsibilities of an independent life, we hereby submit that the time has come for the redemption of America's solemn promise to declare and recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands.

AGUILAR PIMENTEL.

Mr. KING also presented a resolution adopted by the American Mining Congress, which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Passed by American Mining Congress, Washington, D. C., December 4, 1931]

Resolution offered by A. G. Mackenzie

Whereas the expansion of credit beyond the supporting power of its metallic gold base has been a prime factor everywhere present in the world-wide business depression, with consequent disastrous fall in commodity prices which has made unprofitable the production and exchange of goods and services; and

Whereas metallic money reserves, nonfluctuating as to value, are essential to minimize undue inflation and deflation, to restore the orderly processes of industry and trade, and to maintain them in periods of prosperity and depression alike; and

Whereas domestic industry and trade can be greatly stimulated and improved through expansion of foreign markets, which in turn can be most effectively developed through encouragement of the production in all countries of the commodities each country can most advantageously provide for sale to other countries; and

Whereas large and important productive and consuming areas of the world employ silver as a money medium, and the buying power of silver-using peoples has been largely destroyed by the sharp decline in the comparative value of their money medium with corresponding elimination of them from world markets: Therefore be it

Resolved by the American Mining Congress, That it hereby pledges its assistance and support to such practical methods as shall be presented for the acceptable stabilization of silver so as to permit its employment wherever needed as money and as a monetary and credit base and enable silver-using peoples to participate under equitable conditions in trade with peoples that employ gold for such purposes.

STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT SLOAN, OF GENERAL MOTORS CORPORATION

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD two brief paragraphs from the latest report of Mr. Alfred P. Sloan, jr., president of General Motors Corporation, to his stockholders. The report is dated December 1. These significant paragraphs bear specifically upon two considerations now challenging the attention of Congress and the country. First is the importance of understanding that the automobile has wholly graduated from a luxury into a necessity, with a family status in the average American home second only to food, shelter, and clothing, and therefore that it can not logically be part of any extra luxury-tax program. I may add that we have more passenger motor cars per capita than we have telephones or users of domestic electrical appliances. The second consideration which I emphasize in this excerpt is the brave confidence with which this great industrial organization confronts the future, confident of a better turn, and prepared to take advantage of the bitter lessons taught by economic travail.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Notwithstanding the very subnormal rate of operations at which the automotive industry in common with all other industries is operating, I might at this time reaffirm the statement that I have made before to the effect that the motor car is to-day in the strongest position in its history from the standpoint of having become an economic necessity. The fact that next to food, shelter, and clothing the motor car has the first lien on the family budget remains unchallenged. The fact that gasoline consumption—a measure of car usage—will have reached, in all probability, in 1931 the largest volume in history demonstrates that despite the economic conditions prevailing car-mile inventory is being consumed, which means that renewal of that inventory in the form of increased purchases of motor cars must be only a question of time. I am strongly of the opinion that as confidence in the future increases and a turn in the general trend occurs the automotive industry will contribute importantly in accelerating the return to a more normal state of affairs.

I have mentioned in previous statements that a situation such as we are passing through has both its destructive and its constructive sides. As to the former, we are all too familiar with the distress, disappointment, and suffering that are essential parts of such a situation. From the standpoint of the latter, it must be recognized that there has been brought about an elimination of the inefficiency, waste, and false thinking that accompany periods of intense and prolonged prosperity and inflation. Equally important is the fact that out of the situation problems have arisen the recognition of which is sure to mean progress in our industrial development. Out of it also is bound to come a great acceleration in technical progress. All of these factors mean nothing more or less than the building of the foundation for a greater and, I believe, a more stable prosperity.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have a letter in the nature of a petition from the Olympia Chamber of Commerce, State of Washington. I do not very often ask that communications of this kind be printed in the RECORD, but this is such a strong appeal to the patriotism of our people and has attached to it a statement of such an interesting character that I ask unanimous consent that they may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and statement were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OLYMPIA, WASH., November 27, 1931.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am attaching hereto an article prepared by two citizens of this community dealing with what is probably the most important subject of the present day—unemployment and the depression due to economic conditions.

A study of the thought or idea back of this article made an appeal to a number of students of our present troubles, and their reaction was entirely favorable, in that the purchasing public, to make it possible for the wheels of industry to continue must have a patriotic viewpoint.

As we recall it, during the war approximately 57,000 lives were sacrificed on the field of battle. Is it unreasonable to suppose that should present conditions continue throughout the winter that the loss of lives through suicide, caused by mental worries, starvation, lack of clothing, and proper housing facilities will not reach a total as large if not larger? And, furthermore, shall we lose sight of the fact that women and children will be included in the casualty list?

Unquestionably the individual who is drawing approximately the same compensation for his work, and in a number of instances with no reduction in remuneration is withholding, through fear of still further depression, the purchasing of manufactured products required right now until this coming year. Nothing we believe will produce quicker results than the returning to normal consumption of our necessities, affording employment and restoring confidence. To be effective, however, the patriotic appeal must be a national one. Hence our writing to you at such length.

We believe "patriotic buying" will have its effect on labor in a direct way. It will give the employed greater confidence, and he, too, will do his share of spending. The unemployed will accept it as the first direct move to put them immediately into a job.

Patriotic buying will force patriotic selling. The merchant who fails to meet this situation in a patriotic way will be in the same position as the wage earner who refuses to work for less. Both will be out of the picture as noticeably as the slacker was during the war.

The same procedure, methods, and facilities used in the sale of Liberty bonds during the war can be applied to this idea of patriotic buying. The 4-minute men, ministers from the pulpits of their churches, teachers in the schools, the spectators at athletic events, use of the radio-broadcasting chains, and even the proper slogan on the stamp cancellation machines in our post offices will tend to the restoration of business, reduction of unemployment, resumption of confidence, and the saving of human lives.

We believe that the subjects contained in the accompanying article merit your most thoughtful consideration.

"Patriotic buying will end the depression."

With kindest personal regards, we are,

Very sincerely yours,

OLYMPIA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
RALPH L. SHEPHERD,
Secretary-Manager.

It is just as possible to do our bit toward the quick elimination of the factors that are causing this depression as it was to do our bit during the World War. In the World War we spent and fought and killed and saved and sacrificed to overcome troubles existing outside our borders. In this crisis we have greater troubles within our own borders, a crisis that will kill this winter, through suicides, sickness, privation, more of our human beings than died in the World War. It will kill women and children, and in this respect only is it different and worse than the World War.

War as a national crisis has always united the American people into a solid group, willing to work together for the accomplishment of one purpose, the successful termination of hostilities. During times of peace, prosperous or otherwise, the American people have seldom, if ever, joined hands to advance any one particular cause. Patriotism burns high during a war, but the flames die down when peace comes. President Hoover has declared the present economic crisis second only to war, as a national problem, and has called upon the citizens of the country to stand fast to ride down the depression and bring back normal times.

Is this crisis second to war?

Patriotic citizens gave up sugar during the war, sent wheat flour to Europe to feed the troops, and did a dozen other things to bring victory. Even children took their pennies and bought savings stamps. A like outburst of patriotism that will lead to the purchase of things needed now or will be needed in the spring, but being done without, would solve the depression problem.

During the recent World War the citizens of this country followed the advice of the Government leaders and endured many hardships to bring victory to American arms. Those hardships have not been forgotten by citizens; rather they are well remembered and easily recalled. To-day the country faces an emergency as acute, perhaps more acute, than war. At least millions are out of work and facing starvation, a situation that did not exist during the war. The war was won by a united Nation standing steadfast to accomplish one end. Why, then, can not the present economic crisis be overcome in the same manner, by a citizen group willing to unite, if necessary, to bring back normal conditions?

Let us put this on a patriotic basis. Is patriotism limited to war? Is not patriotism the greatest of all national principles? During the war patriotic citizens bought Liberty bonds. The need now is for patriotic citizens to buy the products of labor.

If the people of the country whose incomes have been maintained on pretty much the same basis this year as last will purchase now the things they need or are going to need, whether those things be automobiles, shoes, suits, or other manufactured articles, there will be an immediate demand for more products, and men now out of work will earn money to feed their hungry children. Once back at work, they will be able to purchase other products they need, and presently the depression will be a thing of the past. All that is needed is for concerted action to start the circle moving and everybody will benefit. And let us stop and think about this buying idea. Buying will end the depression. Why can't it start now, before the winter takes its heavy toll of our good people? Buying next year or next spring will be too late. Going into war six months later would have been too late. Where does the difference exist between a crisis of this kind and a crisis of war? Is it because patriotism is an ideal for war only that we will not be patriotic now in a crisis worse than war?

Put men back to work now! Not wholly because it will start factories, building new and more products, or give the merchant new and more business, but because it will immediately put food into the mouths of the women and children of those men who want work. It will save more lives, perhaps it will create more happiness than the winning of any war ever did.

"Patriotic buying will end the depression."

INTERGOVERNMENTAL INDEBTEDNESS—SOLDIERS' BONUS

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I have two telegrams in the nature of petitions which I would like to have the clerk to read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read the telegrams, as follows:

TACOMA, WASH., December 16, 1931.

Senator DILL,
Washington State Senator, Washington, D. C.:

Six thousand members Department of Washington Veterans of Foreign Wars urge you to withhold favorable vote on foreign debt moratorium until World War widows and orphans pensions and cash payment of bonus are assured. War veterans should come before foreign nations. America first then save Europe if necessary.

LEONARD A. SULLIVAN,
Commander Department of Washington,
Veterans of Foreign Wars of United States.

TACOMA, WASH., December 15, 1931.

Senator C. C. DILL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Wild West Post, No. 91, Veterans of Foreign Wars, 992 members, vigorously object to having the foreign debt moratorium even considered until the widows and orphans of veterans pensions and adjusted compensation in full bills have been passed. Members demand that our own citizens be cared for first.

O. O. DRUMM, Commander.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have received the same telegrams, but shall not ask that they be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The telegrams presented by the Senators from Washington will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

As in executive session,

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the nominations of Ralph E. Smith, of Wisconsin, to be assistant to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in place of Harris F. Mires, resigned, and of Richard N. Elliott, of Indiana, to be Assistant Comptroller General of the United States for a term of 15 years, to which office he was appointed during the last recess of the Senate, vice Lurton Rufus Ginn, and also the nominations of sundry officers in the Internal Revenue, Customs, and Public Health Services, which were placed on the Executive Calendar.

Mr. BORAH, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported favorably the nominations of William R. Castle, jr., of the District of Columbia, to be Under Secretary of State; Harvey H. Bundy, of Massachusetts, to be an Assistant Secretary of State; Green H. Hackworth, of Kentucky, to be legal adviser of the Department of State; Robert P. Skinner, of Ohio, to be envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania, and also the nominations of sundry other officers in the Diplomatic and Foreign Service, which were placed on the Executive Calendar.

CONDITIONS IN MANCHURIA

Mr. JOHNSON. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably, with certain amendments, Senate Resolution 87, and I submit a report (No. 3) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the resolution be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 87) submitted by Mr. JOHNSON on the 14th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the Senate the notes, correspondence, and communications from the Government of the United States to the Governments of China and Japan or to the government of any other nation relating to the present existing conditions in Manchuria, and the controversy between China and Japan, which has resulted in armed encounters in Manchuria; and particularly any messages, notes, or communications from the United States Government to either the Governments of Japan or China referring to the treaty entered into at the city of Washington on the 6th day of February, 1922, by the United States, Belgium, British Empire, China, France, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, and Portugal, known as the 9-power treaty, and referring to the treaty entered into by Japan and China, the United States, and other nations, and commonly known as the Kellogg pact; and also the notes, messages, letters, and communications sent or transmitted by the Government of the United States to the League of Nations, or any individual or committee representing the League of Nations, relating to the said conditions in Manchuria, and the said Chinese and Japanese controversy; or sent or transmitted to any individual or individuals representing the Government of the United States in said matters acting with or in conjunction with the League of Nations or the Council of the League of Nations, or any individual or committee representing the League of Nations or the Council of the League of Nations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from California whether the Secretary of State was heard at the meeting of the committee which considered the resolution?

Mr. JOHNSON. No; the understanding is that he is to be subsequently heard.

Mr. BINGHAM. Let the resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go to the calendar.

POSTPONEMENT OF PAYMENT OF FOREIGN DEBTS

Mr. McKELLAR. At this time I offer an amendment to be proposed to Senate Joint Resolution No. 38 and ask that it may now be read. The amendment is very short.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none, and the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 1, Senate Joint Resolution No. 38, it is proposed to strike out the period, to insert a colon, and the following proviso:

Provided, That it is the sense of the Congress that there should be no further moratoriums, no additional debt-funding legislation, and no further cancellation in whole or in part of the debts mentioned in this joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee desire to have the amendment lie on the table or to have it referred to the committee?

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely desire that the amendment be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is in the committee and the amendment should go to the committee for consideration.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am perfectly willing that the amendment should take that course, but I desire also to have it printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

BOND ISSUE FOR PUBLIC WORKS

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no further concurrent or other resolutions, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 94) submitted by Mr. BLACK on the 15th instant was read, as follows:

Whereas the paramount problem confronting our Nation to-day is unemployment and public distress; and

Whereas this situation exists at a time when the national wealth is the greatest in our history; and

Whereas there is to-day a surplus of food, clothing, and other necessities of life which can not be purchased by millions of American citizens who want and need them, because they are unable to secure work; and

Whereas this condition has stopped the work of our mills and factories and condemned our people to involuntary idleness; and

Whereas this condition has created a national emergency, which calls for quick and effective action, in order to utilize our national resources for the public welfare: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance is authorized and directed to prepare a bill and report to the Senate at the earliest possible date, said bill to authorize the issue and sale of a Government bond issue of $1,000,000,000, and providing for the expenditure of said money throughout the States in the building of highways, bridges, and other public projects, having in view the doing of such work as will be most useful to the public and employing the maximum amount of human labor, and work that can be begun in each particular locality with the least possible delay.

The Committee on Finance, or any properly authorized subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized to conduct such hearings as may be necessary to determine how the money raised by such bond issue shall be expended to accomplish the purposes hereinbefore set out and to determine what other funds should be raised, and how, for a program of public works throughout the States, and for what purposes and in what manner it should be expended.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate for only a very few moments to call attention to the resolution and the action which I desire to request be taken upon it.

Mr. President, this resolution was offered because I believe it was made necessary by the failure of the President and his stabilization committee to act in line with the bill which was passed at the last session of Congress, and which was introduced by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. Under that bill, as referred to in a resolution offered a few days ago by the Senator from New York, it became the duty of the President, by reason of conditions and circumstances which exist in this Nation, to recommend to the Senate and to the House of Representatives an emergency appropriation for public works.

The Senator from New York calls attention in his resolution to the depression which exists, and to the fact that instead of the public-works programs having been increased in recent months public-works programs have been greatly decreased. The Senator from New York calls attention to the duty of the President, under the act which was passed at his instance, to this provision of the law:

SEC. 5. Whenever, upon recommendation of the board, the President finds that there exists, or that within the six months next following there is likely to exist, in the United States or any substantial portion thereof, a period of business depression and unemployment, he is requested to transmit to the Congress by special message, at such time and from time to time thereafter, such supplemental estimates as he deems advisable for emergency appropriations, to be expended during such period upon authorized construction in order to aid in preventing unemployment and permit the Government to avail itself of the opportunity for speedy, efficient, and economical construction during any such period.

We have had a message from the President on the moratorium; we have had a general message which instead of indicating the desire to increase emergency appropriations for public works indicates a desire to decrease emergency appropriations for public works. The resolution of the Senator from New York provides that the President shall be requested to act under the authority given him by law and report to this body at the earliest possible time concerning the things demanded by this statute in order that an emergency appropriation bill may be passed.

Since the President has not acted in compliance with this law—for what reason I do not know—it was my idea in offering this resolution that, pending action by the President, the Finance Committee itself should be called upon to perform these duties in order that the Senate and the House of Representatives may not neglect that which I believe to be the most important thing in America to-day—attempting, so far as possible, to stimulate activities in this country by necessary public works. Therefore my resolution provides as a supplement to the resolution of the Senator from New York that, pending action by the President, the Senate committee shall draw a bill providing for a bond issue and shall determine by evidence heard before it where the work may best be done in a way to use the most human labor, the work to begin as speedily as possible. I offered the resolution because it is my belief individually at the present time that we should not wait any longer before we provide an appropriation for the purpose of putting people to work, because, in my judgment, that is the supreme issue which confronts the Congress and the people at this time.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. Is it not a fact that appropriations have already been made and the money is in the Treasury, and in many instances has been there for two years, but those in charge of the building program, those who administer the law, have simply failed to prosecute the work that has been ordered by Congress and for which money has been provided?

Mr. BLACK. That is my understanding.

Mr. FLETCHER. If that is true, what is the use of issuing bonds, or what is the use of making appropriations, if we can not have the work done under the authority and appropriations already provided? The authorities who are carrying forward the building program are to blame for the delay in giving people employment, because the money has been provided, the projects have been adopted, and everything has been done except to let the contracts and prosecute the work. There is where the trouble lies. It is not, in my judgment, because they are without funds or that there is need of appropriations or need of further funds that should be provided by a bond issue or anything of that sort. The trouble lies in the agencies that ought to go forward with this work failing utterly and inexcusably to prosecute it.

Mr. BLACK. I agree with the Senator that that is partially the trouble. The situation, therefore, is that the Senator from New York has submitted the resolution to which I have referred and I have submitted a resolution supplementary to it. It is my hope that within the next few days those resolutions may be considered by this body. I do not think, however, in view of the fact that a number of Senators have stated that they have not as yet had time to consider and study the entire proposition, that the consideration of the resolution should be insisted upon this morning, but it is my hope and that of the Senator from New York to present to the Senate, at such time as can be agreed upon, the facts concerning the necessity for this work and the necessity for drawing bills and appropriating money in such way that those in charge of the work will be directed and compelled to proceed to meet that which I consider to be the supreme problem facing the American people to-day—the problem of in some way endeavoring to alleviate the widespread unemployment which exists in this Nation. Therefore, I shall not ask for action on the resolution this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE—LETTERS OF GENERAL AGUINALDO AND COMMISSIONER OSIAS

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, some months ago there appeared in the press a statement to the effect that Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo was not in favor of independence for the Philippine Islands. This report was given wide circulation. Representatives of the commission in Washington reported its inaccuracy. But in order to settle the matter I visited General Aguinaldo, who was then confined in a hospital, and asked him to reduce to writing a positive statement on the subject so there might be no longer a dispute as to his position.

He sent to me, at Manila, a letter under date of July 25, 1931, a communication which will set at rest any uncertainty as to his position.

More recently there has appeared in the press, emanating from a small group of Americans in Manila who are opposing independence, the statement that Senator Quezon, Filipino leader, had abandoned his advocacy of independence and now favored merely an extension of Philippine autonomy in government. This statement is untrue, as was the one in relation to Aguinaldo's position, as is evidenced by a letter which I have received from Resident Commissioner CAMILO OSIAS.

It is time the American Congress, both the Senate and the House, should have the facts, and the American people are entitled to have them. To select two of the greater Filipino leaders and deliberately misrepresent their position regarding independence is not only unfair, it is dishonest; and I request therefore the privilege of inserting in the RECORD the letters of General Aguinaldo and Commissioner OSIAS relating to the position in the matter of independence of these two Filipino leaders.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letters are as follows:

Senator HARRY B. HAWES,
Manila Hotel, Manila.

DISTINGUISHED SENATOR: I have read with care the questions you formulated on the subject of Philippine independence. My answers are herein conveyed in the form of a memorial which I have prepared for such use as you may deem convenient. I only regret that, due to my confinement in this hospital, it has not been possible for me to venture into a fuller discussion of the subject. I hope, however, that although the answers are incomplete, you will have an idea of my points of view on the independence of my country.

I am thankful to you from the bottom of my heart for having requested an expression of my opinions on the salient phases of this question, so vital to all of us. The restoration of the Philippine Republic has been the principal longing of my life. That Republic we had erected after tremendous sacrifices; it was the compendium of our dreams as a nation subjugated for three centuries by foreign domination; it forms a part of our very being as a people.

The efforts you are exerting to bring about the restoration of that Republic have the unanimous support of the Filipino people. To you and to your colleagues in the Congress who have assumed the difficult task of helping us in the campaign, we all owe a debt of gratitude. In our hearts you will find the monument to your great work.

No one, I believe, without committing an injustice, could question the sincere and unanimous desire of the Filipino people to obtain their coveted independence. Our revolutions are proof of that desire. Since then the sentiment of the Filipinos regarding their emancipation has not changed.

The insinuation that the popular expressions in favor of independence have been secured by intimidation is without justification. On the contrary, it may be said that the political leaders have had to declare themselves openly for independence, because a contrary behavior would have brought popular condemnation upon them.

The demand for independence by the Filipino people will be more and more pressing as the years go by, not only because of the innate desire of peoples for self-determination, but also because of the assurances given by the United States through her legitimate representatives, both civil and military, that upon occupying these islands America did not entertain designs of exploitation but of emancipation. The delay, therefore, in the concession of independence serves only to accentuate the people's desire for liberation and at the same time to aggravate the political and economic situation of the country.

It is true that the concession of independence will usher in new domestic problems. But it is then that our statesmen could, and will, dedicate themselves to the consideration of these national problems, preferably the economic, which have been and will continue to be neglected and relegated to the background as long as our political situation is not defined in harmony with our age-long aspirations. If we recall our revolutionary epoch of 1896 and 1898, I may be permitted to state that at that time we faced grave internal problems under the dictatorial and revolutionary governments, and later under the Philippine Republic; but thanks to the patriotism and civic spirit of our people we emerged successful from the test to which fate had subjected us.

What is more, I believe that when we are independent we shall have a better kind of democracy than that which prevails in the islands at present. As it is now, it may be said that we have only one political party. The opposition has always been weak, and this is attributable to the system whereby the majority party has intrenched itself formidably in power with the unconscious abetment of the representative of American sovereignty.

Twenty-four years have elapsed since representative government was inaugurated here, and yet the opposition party has not succeeded in coming into power. If things are to continue as they are now, I doubt whether the opposition, no matter what efforts it exerts, could ever succeed the majority party in the Government. With independence, the opposition will have a better chance; many national questions will be the theme of discussion; party responsibility and fiscalization will always be a serious issue. We could then expect periodical changes in party administration and the consequent betterment of the public service.

The possibility of a civil war or of a general disturbance is not an impediment to the concession of independence. Civil wars and uprisings have in many cases been the price which independent peoples have had to pay in order to consolidate their institutions. If it is written that the Filipino people shall pass through such a terrible ordeal, they will not hesitate to do so, provided they could be masters of their destinies. Civil wars, however deplorable, are often inevitable when constitutional means are impotent to restore the reign of law. But, despite all that, I do not believe in the possibility of a civil war or general disorder if independence is granted. By nature we are a peaceful people, lovers of public order, and it is not hazardous to affirm that if we are declared independent there will be a firmer union among the Filipinos brought about by the sense of a common responsibility and desire to support and elevate the country redeemed. This was the case in the days of the Philippine Republic.

With the termination of the present uncertainty in the relations between the Philippines and the United States public attention will be concentrated on our economic problems, capital will emerge from its retirement, and as a result the material progress of the country will be emancipated from its present stagnation.

I believe that a delay of 20 or 30 years in the concession of Philippine independence will work irreparable harm to the cause of economic and political progress, aside from the fact that during such a long period of time new difficulties might arise which would necessitate further postponement of the grant. At present the country is literally mortgaged to the United States. Twenty years hence, therefore, the big interests will have intrenched themselves in such a manner and will command such means as would enable them easily to stifle our future as well as our desires for emancipation. Those big interests which made the independence of Cuba a solemn fiction will, if Philippine independence were further delayed, make that independence an eternal aspiration impossible of realization.

If the present situation continues for 20 years more, at the end of that period the Philippines will be a political as well as economic tributary of American capital. Individual initiative in the manhood of our race will have disappeared, and we will be nothing but a nation of bureaucrats and employees groaning beneath the thumbs of political chieftains, and whatever vestige of democracy we have now will then be a myth.

Other contingencies, too, might arise if the granting of independence were to be delayed further. The difficulties incident upon severance of relations will naturally increase a thousandfold. Various other new interests of the United States might be affected by the continuance of our association. Tariffs on our products will have to be imposed in the meantime if certain American industries are to be saved from extinction. A greater agricultural or industrial development here will have its telling effect on America's own agricultural and industrial interests. The severance of free-trade relations would seem to be inevitable. Congress could not prevent that even if it wanted to. The time, therefore, will surely come when the relations between America and the Philippines will be purely political; we will be a foreign country to her as regards trade relations, but politically we will be under her supervision and protection.

On the other hand, if independence were granted now, it would stimulate our initiative as a nation. The idea of political dependence will disappear from our minds. We could begin to fashion the structure of our nationality in our own way. We shall grapple with our problems in accordance with our capacity and means. And we shall have an opportunity to be strong and really prosperous, a thing we never can accomplish under the tutelage of another nation.

The argument that we are not prepared for independence is gratuitous. And in the strict sense, we are not being prepared for independence anyway even under the aegis of the United States. Where is the preparation for an army and navy, for aviation, and for aerial defense? Where is the preparation in diplomacy and consular service? It is true that much has been accomplished under American guidance; we have better roads, sumptuous government offices, a higher standard of living, and a modern system of public instruction. Nevertheless, as the enemies of independence would interpret the word "preparation," we have not got it, in spite of 30 years' tutelage. And two centuries from now we will be told the same thing.

The present uncertainty, as I have stated above, retards the economic development of the country. Capitalists have said that they do not care to make investments here in view of that uncertainty in our political status. If the uncertainty were terminated, the situation will change. Even in bolshevistic Russia and in China, with its continuous civil wars, foreign capital keeps pouring in. It can be safely predicted, I believe, that once independent we also can get desirable foreign capital invested here. Our industries and financial growth will also be accelerated. The responsibilities attendant upon the changed status will be so great that our people will exert all their efforts to create more wealth with which to meet their obligations. This has been the experience of countries that have attained their independence, and the Philippines does not have to be the exception.

I would prefer the opening up of world markets for our products. We have many tropical products which are in great demand not only in the United States but also in other lands. If we could place those products in the markets of other lands besides, it would surely be to our advantage. With the possible exception of cotton and steel and machineries, we could produce the things we need locally. We do not need much for our daily living. Foodstuffs we could produce in abundance. The raw materials for the primary manufactures are here also in abundance. We could be in a position to compete in the markets of the world.

The free-trade relations we now have with the United States were established by the Congress. I do not remember that we have asked for this arrangement. It has been beneficial to the islands, to be sure, but from the point of view of our national destiny it has deprived us of other markets and hence other chances.

The result of this free-trade arrangement is as follows: Encouraged by the demand in the American market, we have produced more sugar and we have also increased our production of oil and other products. But this increase is not now looked upon with favor by American agricultural interests and we are being told to restrict our output, because we are competing with American products in the United States. At the same time we are told to develop our country economically if we desire to be free. It would seem, therefore, that we are between the devil and the deep blue sea.

I venture to assert, then, that the economic structure of the country will be more stable if we secure an access to other markets besides those of the United States, although for reasons of gratitude and other considerations which we hold toward her we would be willing always to consider America as the favored nation under equal circumstances.

I am convinced that the contemplated readjustment of free-trade relations should come after the concession of independence. Disposed as we are to face the consequences imposed by new obligations that will arise our country will intensify its activities in all lines of endeavor with those new obligations in mind. Necessity is the mother of progress, and on the necessities incident upon an independent government, the Filipino people will construct the edifice of their prosperity and national greatness. On the understanding, therefore, that the adjustment regarding free trade should not precede the concession of independence, notwithstanding opinions to the contrary, I would suggest a period of not more than 10 years within which we hope to be able to adjust the economic difficulties attendant upon separation in a way satisfactory to both peoples. Let independence come at the earliest hour, however, at the latest within the next five years, inasmuch as the continuation of the present guardianship will kill our spirit of initiative as well as the characteristic elements of our nationality.

There is no doubt that the danger of a foreign invasion will be greater when we are independent than now under the sovereignty of the United States, this in spite of America's commitment under the quadruple treaty that the Philippines will not be fortified further. The mere presence of the United States here, without necessity of fortification, is sufficient guaranty against any possible danger of invasion. The country is perfectly aware of this advantage, but it can not sacrifice to it its independence ideal.

It would be desirable, of course, if the principal powers of the Pacific could reach an agreement guaranteeing the neutrality of the islands. International relations are slowly evolving toward concord and peace, and a treaty of neutrality would be a good guaranty of the external safety of the Philippines in the future. But if there should be difficulties in the realization of such a treaty the country will not renounce its ideal because of those difficulties. The Filipino people desire their independence and they will pay the price that destiny might exact.

Our people have waged two revolutions, shed much blood, and sacrificed innumerable lives and fortune in order to attain their political independence; they are disposed now to forego the material advantages they enjoy and even the greater ones they might enjoy in the future in exchange for their liberation. After all, these are transient advantages, and we have seen how, recently, a movement has been started, and is gathering momentum, to terminate the present tariff relations between the Philippines and the United States. Hence even under the present state of dependence there is a possibility, not remote, of those advantages disappearing.

The preservation of our public lands for the present and future generation of Filipinos is undoubtedly one of the serious problems which will require most careful study by our statesmen. The present laws, however, offer sufficient guarantees of protection for foreign and for local capital alike, and whatever attempt there will be to liberalize the present public land laws will meet with decided and vehement popular protest. No political party would dare father a measure which would thus rile popular sentiment.

It has been argued that with the advent of independence there will be a backslide in the sanitary conditions of these islands. Nothing is more erroneous. The present sanitary service, which is a success, has been in the hands of Filipino officials for more than 15 years. In case of independence, therefore, the danger is not in a possible backsliding but in going ahead too fast, for then there will be greater desire to serve the country recently emancipated.

The so-called Moro problem has never existed and does not exist. During the life of the short-lived Philippine Republic our Mohammedan kinsmen shared with us in the benefits of that government and abided by the orders and decrees promulgated. I repeat that there is no such problem. It has been fabricated by the enemies of independence in order to discredit us in the eyes of the Government and people of the United States. Our Mohammedan brothers are conscious of our desire and solicitude to impart to them the benefits of civilization enjoyed by the Christian Filipinos.

With respect to the oft-repeated Japanese menace, I would state that Japan has a noble rôle to play in this part of the globe as a nation which is at the vanguard of the other nations of the Far East. It would be a dark day for oriental peoples if Japan would seek to impose her sovereignty on every one of them. The awakening of China and other oriental countries during recent years is not a sign that would encourage Japan to entertain designs of suzerainty over the Far East. On the other hand, it would be to her advantage if she could have the friendship and good will of all her neighbors. Overlordship based on might has never endured. Weak peoples will not continue weak forever. Always there have been upheavals resulting in their emancipation. National consciousness and the instinct of self-preservation have always saved nations, however small, from humiliation and disaster.

There are, it is true, many more Chinese than Japanese in the Philippines. Whether, however, the Chinese constitute a menace to the country is something we can not as yet foresee. Indications are to the contrary. The Chinese here are peaceful and law-abiding. They do not bother the Government nor their neighbors They comply with their obligations and attend industriously to their industrial and commercial speculations, in which it is hard to excel them. They mix with Filipinos; they intermarry with Filipino women and their children become good Filipino citizens. A treaty on immigration between China and the Philippines would be good for the preservation of their friendly relations.

I believe that the fact that there are only about 7,000 Americans who have taken up their residence here is due to the distance from the United States and also to the climate here. Having been born and reared in surroundings vastly different from ours, the lure of home and of dear relations would be too strong for them to want to stay here all their lives.

Our feeling of gratitude toward the United States will be intensified with the grant of independence. This is but natural. America and her illustrious statesmen have repeatedly announced that her presence here is not actuated by selfish motives, nor is it for exploitation, but to aid us in the establishment of a representative system of self-government. We placed implicit faith in her word. Its fulfillment will be the occasion for rejoicing throughout the islands; it will strengthen our faith in the sincerity of the United States. To our people the waiting has been too long. Many Filipinos of worth who have fought for the freedom of the land have already passed on—they would have been glad to witness the restoration of the Republic they proclaimed and defended. If, on the other hand, the United States does not fulfill her promise, then the Filipinos will be convinced of the injustice that has been their fate; they will realize that all their efforts and sacrifices, in war and in peace, have been in vain, and that they made a great mistake, for which their children and their children's children will rebuke them, in having trusted in the word of the United States.

Reiterating my sincere gratefulness to you and to those other Members of Congress who are taking an interest in the independence of my country, I am,

Very sincerely yours,

EMILIO AGUINALDO.

ST. JOSEPH'S HOSPITAL,
Manila, July 25, 1931.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., December 7, 1931.

MY DEAR SENATOR: There has been such a subtle publicity of late seeking to convey the information, or rather misinformation, that Senator Quezon has abandoned his well-known independence stand after his recent return to the Philippines. Of course, I am confident that no one who really knows Mr. Quezon and his record of persistent fight for our national emancipation would give credence to the propaganda, and I am writing you, not because I fear that you would believe the erroneous news that is going the rounds but merely to place in your hands textual quotations from his statement.

In a report submitted to the last session of the Philippine Legislature, Mr. Quezon, president of the Philippine Senate, under the caption, "What I would Do," said:

"(1) I would try to obtain immediate, absolute, and complete independence with free trade between America and the Philippines for 10 years. Safeguards for the independence and integrity of Philippine territory through a treaty entered into by the great powers of the world. If this plan fails, (2) I would strive for the fixing of a period necessary for our economic readjustment, after which the Filipino people will be given absolute independence, or will be free to choose whether they will have independence or not. During such period of economic readjustment, the government of the Philippines will be autonomous, with a chief executive elected by the people, and with such powers as may be necessary to take all the measures designed to promote the country's political, economic, cultural, and social development in keeping with the needs and the genius of the Filipino people. I would give my consent to the intervention and control of America over those matters which directly or indirectly might affect our international relations, until the complete separation between the two countries shall have been effected. (3) If I saw that none of the plans above outlined had any probability of being approved I would support any measure which would insure an action by the next Congress on the Philippine question. This means that I would accept immediate, absolute, and complete independence without free trade or any other plan that would put an end to the present uncertainty and American control of our government, which will bring us nearer to the full attainment of our national ideals."

Referring to his conversations with the Secretary of War when Mr. Quezon was last in Washington, as the head of the Philippine mission sent by the Philippine Legislature to work for independence, he said in the same report:

"I told him (the Secretary) finally that both the conservative and the radical Filipinos would be united in favor of immediate independence, even without free trade, if the other alternative only was the continuation of the present uncertainty of the political and economic relations between America and the Philippines."

The foregoing should be sufficient to show that the propaganda to the effect that Mr. Quezon has abandoned his stand in favor of the imperative necessity of remedying the unsatisfactory and uncertain status of the Philippines on the basis of the early grant of independence is without foundation, if, indeed, it may not be said to be a misinformation. The Filipino people with Senator Quezon naturally wish "a free and independent but prosperous Philippines," but between independence without prosperity and prosperity without freedom they would unhesitatingly accept the former.

Mr. Quezon, as the recognized leader of the Filipinos, spoke truly when in the same report he declared that "in the interests of both of the United States and the Philippines, the present relation between them, which is that of the ruler over the subject must terminate."

By way of conclusion he further added:

"* * * Our relations with the American people, if there are to be any, must be inspired by the principle of self-determination and voluntary partnership. It is only thus that an effective and cordial cooperation between America and the Philippines may be secured in a common design to promote the moral and material interests of both peoples."

Knowing of your zeal and disinterestedness in favor of Philippine independence, I am writing this that you may be in possession of the facts.

Trusting that you will continue helping us secure early congressional action to redeem America's pledge to withdraw her sovereignty over the Philippines and grant the independence which the Filipino people consider supreme in life, I beg leave to remain,

Yours for Philippine independence,

CAMILO OSIAS.

Hon. HARRY B. HAWES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE—SPEECH OF SENATOR HAWES BEFORE THE PHILIPPINE LEGISLATURE

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, during my visit last summer to the Philippines I became a victim of the propaganda of suppression and misinformation coming from a Manila source opposing independence of the islands.

Fortunately, a stenographic record of my speech before the Legislature of the Philippines was made and printed in the record of the Philippine Legislature, which is similar in form to our CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I ask permission to insert in the RECORD a copy of the official record of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

Mr. President, Mr. Speaker, and members of the Philippine Senate and House of Representatives, the many courtesies and wonderful hospitality extended to me since my arrival in your beautiful islands now culminates in the honor of this invitation to address in joint session both branches of your legislature.

It affords me an opportunity to restate my own position in the matter of independence, but more important still, to give to you briefly not my personal opinion but the opinion of the committee which reported favorably on this subject.

There should be no partisan politics injected into this matter. It is too serious, too vital to permit party advantage or factional gain to have the smallest consideration. I have observed that both of your political parties have placed this subject upon the highest human pedestal. I hope there will be no division between Democrats and Republicans in my country.

Senator CUTTING, joint author of the bill, is a Republican. I am a Democrat. There was no partisan politics in the preparation of our bill. It will be supported by both Republicans and Democrats as it is here by both of your political parties.

It has not occurred to me in receiving your hospitality that it was personal. It was because of the bill that your generous hospitality has been extended. It would have been the same for any other man. If it had been Senator CUTTING, the reception would have been identical.

So I have not had the feeling that the united response to my inquiry was personal. It happened that Senator PITTMAN and myself were here, so the answer was given more directly to us.

Neither Senator PITTMAN or myself have attempted to influence your opinion.

I came to your islands because they interested me. There was a romance connected with them. Your repeated struggles and sacrifices for liberty are known. You have a real mission to perform in this part of the world; you must do it yourselves; it can not be done for you by another race of people. So, the more quickly the sole responsibility is yours, the more rapid will be the advance.

We sent to you some of our great men. Their personalities have impressed themselves upon your government, have advanced your welfare, and, I am sure, promoted your happiness. I have a feeling of justifiable pride in their personal achievements in the matters of health, sanitation, and jurisprudence.

We are familiar with your struggles for liberty under the old Spanish rule, and with your revolution of 1896 and that of 1898, showing a united intention to secure freedom.

Since the arrival of the American school teacher, your children have been taught the finest pages of American history, which has added to your natural aspiration for liberty, self-government, and independence.

Starting almost immediately after the war, our teachers and our public men have read to you our Declaration of Independence, celebrated the Fourth of July, and upon every occasion extolled the virtues of our colonial ancestors. This combined the history of your country and my country in their endeavors to secure self-government.

To find myself in your far provinces, introduced to large audiences by graduates of the leading American universities, such as Yale, Harvard, Cornell, Chicago, Columbia, and others, increases my pride in American accomplishments.

The subject of my special inquiry was to determine whether you earnestly, unitedly ask for independence, for complete self-government; whether you realize that the severance of the ties with America would carry with it heavy responsibilities, possibly increase in taxes, and some loss of trade.

I desired an answer to the propaganda directed partly from Manila that the voice of independence was a small, well-organized voice, or whether it came from all classes of your people, your leading business men, your executive officials, the governors of your provinces, the mayors of your cities, your local councils, from the schools, and of great importance, from your press.

Our Senate committee, in its report in May, 1930, said:

"Your committee desires to call attention to a propaganda intimating that the Philippine leaders are not sincere in their demands for independence. * * * It is insinuated that the Filipino people do not actually desire independence; their leaders do not really favor it."

On the day of my arrival in Manila, June 18, I made this statement:

"The object of my present visit is to ascertain just one thing: Do the Philippines want to be independent in the near future? Are there any Filipinos who are opposed to it? If the Philippines are united, determined, and persistent, in my judgment independence will be granted.

"The American people never intended to hold the Philippines for the sole purpose of commercially exploiting its people. The American people want your trade, your friendship, your confidence. We desire even more, your respect and your affection."

These statements by the Senate committee and myself are clear and should be easily understood.

Your answer to the charge of insincerity has been given with unanimity. It came in great volume, with energy and good-natured enthusiasm. No one can doubt either its strength or convincing sincerity.

This remarkable unanimity of opinion in the matter of independence by your people, your public men, and your local newspapers will be all controlling in America. Stories have gone to the States conveying a wrong impression, and upon these stories editorials have been written conveying a wrong impression of the attitude of your people.

The subject of independence involves the contentment and the happiness of 13,000,000 people, and rational happiness and content should be the first object of all government. It is unfair to your people and to our people to deceive them regarding either the unanimity or sincerity of your expressions.

The question of the sincerity of Filipinos in asking for independence was not raised by me. The responsibility for its presentation must rest upon those who introduced the doubt, who made the charge.

The door of doubt was not opened by me. My small part has been merely to assist in ascertaining the truth. You have now closed the door upon the falsehood.

In my country we have political leaders who express themselves, and they are supposed to express the opinion of their followers; we have great national conventions that make declarations; we have city councils and representative bodies that control our cities. We have a vigorous and intelligent press. These are the usual avenues of expression of public opinion, and it was to similar bodies here that I directed my inquiry.

In every city visited I have been presented with resolutions passed by the city council. In every province I have been accompanied by the governor of the province. In every place there have been arches across the roads; there have been parades; there have been flowers; there have been delegations of men and women, and the representatives of the old soldiers of Aguinaldo. There has been but one answer; it was complete, effective, conclusive.

Your press united in stating that the independence demonstration on the 12th of this month was the greatest of its kind ever held in the Philippine Islands; greatest in point of numbers; greatest in enthusiasm; greatest in good nature and good order.

So your answer came from every source, from your political leaders, from your organized towns, from your newspapers. From every source there was one reply: We want independence. We realize the sacrifices that must be made. We have an affection for the American people; we consider them to be our friends; we rely upon the fulfillment of their promise. This will add to our gratitude.

THE PARALYSIS OF UNCERTAINTY

Having answered hostile propaganda and disposed of the question of sincerity, we come to the serious matter of economic stagnation created by uncertainty as to the future, harmful in its effect both in America and in the Philippines.

Upon this point our Senate committee said:

"Every witness who appeared at the hearings, whether he was an official of the central or the insular government or a private person with admitted economic interests at stake, agreed that a definite policy toward the Philippines would be both necessary and desirable as a means of curing the present uncertainty.

"The initiative of the Filipino is hampered by his status. The development of 114,000 square miles of island area is being handicapped, and certain manufacturing possibilities are being dwarfed because of the general uncertainty.

"American capital, doubtful of the future, declines to enter the islands. Foreign capital with no voice whatever in the settlement of the problem will not invest there.

"Under such conditions satisfactory economic progress is impossible."

During the past 12 years billions of American money have been invested abroad, but less than one-sixteenth of 1 per cent of these investments have been made in the Philippine Islands, notwithstanding the fact that the islands have great latent resources.

The reason is the uncertainty which exists. This has prevented any new important capital from coming into the islands.

Not only has this uncertainty prevented the introduction of new American capital, but it is having its serious consequences in the matter of the American population in the Philippines.

In 1903 the population of the Philippine Islands was 7,635,426. To-day it is estimated at 13,000,000, showing an increase in 28 years of approximately five and a half millions.

But during the same period, although the islands have been under American sovereignty for over 30 years, there has been a decrease in the number of American residents of the islands.

In 1903, over a quarter of a century ago, civilian Americans in the Philippines numbered 8,135; to-day the estimate is only 7,000, of whom, it is stated, about 6,000 reside in Manila and only about 1,000 are scattered through your Provinces.

In my opinion, this decrease is due to two causes. The first is climatic conditions. The second is uncertainty regarding the future.

American business men will not come here or make any new investments until this uncertainty is removed. Young American employees will not come because of the uncertainty of the tenure of their employment.

Few young Americans are here now. The American residents are nearly all gray-haired veterans. Neither money nor men will come from America until this uncertainty is disposed of.

Still more embarrassing is the present uncertain political status of the Filipino. Under this uncertainty a Filipino is not an American citizen; he is not a Filipino. A foreigner under certain of our statutory provisions, he is uncertain as to his national status, and not sure of his international status. He carries two flags, and may not even be permitted to peacefully express his appeals in a plebiscite. He can not elect his national executives, not even the mayor of his capital city of 350,000 people, and yet, from his pockets comes the money to pay all the cost of government, including the salaries of all appointed officials.

With the exception of the salary of $10,000 a year to each of the two Resident Commissioners to the United States Congress, and a contribution to the enforcement of quarantine regulations and the Coast and Geodetic Survey, all expenses of the Government are borne by the insular treasury.

Our Department of War reports that we have spent in your islands up to June 30, 1929, $485,000,000 for Army and Navy purposes and only $8,000,000 for civil government, of which $3,000,000 was for emergency relief purposes.

Even beautiful Baguio, rising 5,000 feet above the sea, giving pure and cool air to your citizens, was built and is maintained by money from the Philippine treasury. I was surprised to find that some Americans did not know that the entire cost of government in the islands, the government of Manila and the summer capital at Baguio, is maintained by Philippine and not American taxes.

Fifteen years ago, in 1916, the Congress passed the Jones Act, and since that time there have been no important changes in your organic law. In my opinion, in view of the preamble to the Jones Act—

"Whereas it was never the intention of the people of the United States in the incipiency of the War with Spain to make it a war of conquest or for territorial aggrandizement; and

"Whereas it is, as it always has been, the purpose of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein"—

the government of the Philippines was not intended to be permanent but merely a prelude to independence.

There are some justifiable excuses for the silence of Congress during these years. The World War began in 1914 and its effects were felt by the peoples of all the earth, and the thought of the world, including the United States, was directed to this world-wide conflagration. In the year 1917 the United States entered the World War, marshalled its resources, contributed its money, placed the burdens of great bond issues upon our people for the maintenance of our Army and Navy, contributed money to assist our allies, and the attention of Congress was diverted not only from our domestic affairs but from the problems of the Philippines.

Readjustments because of the war, the depression, agricultural losses, and other immediate domestic problems have absorbed the attention of our Congress. But there can now be no excuse for further delay in the matter of a permanent decision of our future relations with your people.

There are but three courses.

The first is admission into statehood in the American Union, which for political reasons now seems impractical.

Second, the creation of a modern colonial system similar to the Canadian plan. But this would not settle either the tariff or the immigration problem, because Congress will still have the power to change its Philippine policy at any succeeding session. The present uncertain situation will continue.

And, third, independence, with its responsibilities, but also with its contentment, leaving each separate nation to deal with the other upon the basis of mutual interest, trust, and confidence.

One of these plans should now be adopted.

I realize the effect of uncertainty upon your own deliberations. With the thought of independence uppermost in the minds of your members, it must be difficult to give undivided attention to economic and other subjects.

TEMPORARY CHARACTER OF THE JONES LAW

The Jones Act created political machinery for your Government somewhat similar to the early colonial governments of Great Britain prior to our American Revolution, the strongest evidence that it was temporary in character.

While our present administration remains much the same, Great Britain has since that period completely changed her form of colonial government, with the exception of India, which is in a state of transition. She has approved the policy of agreeing with the colonies as to what form of government they should have.

In this way she solved her Irish question by calling the representatives of Ireland and agreeing with them as to what was to be the nature of their future relations.

Every historical fact demonstrates conclusively that the present form of government established under the Jones Act was temporary. On this subject the Senate committee said:

"If there be any doubt left that the ultimate purpose of the United States in its legislation with respect to the islands has been to prepare them for independence, it should be removed by the fact that in the 30 years in which we have held the Philippines we have not attempted to incorporate them.

"By the operation of our own laws we have set up what must be a temporary government, in that we have continued the administration of certain affairs of the Philippines in the War Department. We have left the general supervision of the Philippine Government to the War Department. We have provided that the Governor General report annually to some official designated by the President of the United States, and that official is not the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Secretary of State, but the Secretary of War. The plain implication is that our tenure of the Philippines is temporary in character."

THE ELEMENT OF TIME

There may be honest differences of opinion as to whether independence should be given in 5, 7, or 10 years, but the proposal to delay decision for 15 or 20 or 30 years is not a plan; it is a subterfuge.

It is dodging the issue; it is a subtle plea for permanent possession. It does not end, it continues, the present paralyzing uncertainty.

To propose a plan to be executed when the proposer will probably be dead is what might be termed a grave-yard settlement, a passing of responsibility to a succeeding generation, a safe guess upon what may happen, by persons who, while boldly looking 30 years in to the future, refuse to decide a situation which is immediately before them.

Those opposed to independence should have the courage to admit it. If there are reasons why the present situation should continue, frankness may furnish information for which crocodile tears are not a substitute.

OPINION OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE

The Senate committee's report so well expresses my own judgment and it is so comprehensive that I take the liberty of reading its conclusions:

"1. That it is the policy of the American Government to free rather than retain the Philippines.

"2. That the Philippine people are justified in their plea for independence at this time.

"3. That the Philippine people have made remarkable strides in the path of self-government.

"4. That at the present time the Philippine people are conducting, except in a few instances, the affairs of government.

"5. That the Philippine people are keenly alive to the untoward eventualities of independence.

"6. That the Philippine people, realizing serious hardships may result from independence and from the loosening of the ties that now bind them to American sovereignty, prefer to risk these hardships at the present time, when they are confident of their ability to endure them, than at a remote date when the hazards of separation from the American Government would be so great as either to threaten disaster or to preclude their independence.

"7. That, so far as the interests of Americans are concerned in Philippine trade, it will be more simple to grant independence at an early date than when their interests have a deeper and more far-reaching contact with the Philippines.

"8. That at the present time the conditions existing in the Philippines and the uncertainty of the future status of these islands is operating to dwarf their initiative, handicap their agricultural and industrial development, hamper their efforts to obtain investment of foreign capital, and militate against their enjoying the full possibilities of their economic development.

"9. That there are important elements, both American and Philippine, whose interests demand some action on the part of Congress in the settlement of this national uncertainty.

"10. That the action of the American Government in relation to the Philippines will determine America's prestige in the Orient.

"11. That the Philippine Islands, of doubtful advantage at present, from a purely trade standpoint, have little or no utility in times of war and might even become a burden and a threat to us in the event of our embroilment with certain powers.

"12. That proposals to postpone the date for the granting of Philippine independence for any great number of years will result in the expansion of certain economic ties which may ultimately make impossible the granting of independence.

"13. That no selfish motives or commercial advantage of expansion should interfere with the redemption of our pledges to these people.

"14. That the Philippine people are unanimous in their demand for early and complete independence.

"The United States owes a solemn duty to the Philippine people—the duty of an honest declaration of our future intent. If we have decided to retain these islands under some form of colonial government we should be frank enough to proclaim it. We should not further encourage national aspirations to ultimate independence on the part of the Philippine people if we are ourselves opposed to their independence.

"If the delay of independence for 30 years is for the purpose of defeating independence we should say so frankly."

OUR CONGRESS

Fifteen years have passed without amendments to the law under which the islands are governed, althought changing our own laws regarding our relations with the world and by new treaties. This must be a disappointment, at least a cause for conjecture.

In addition to the national perplexities occassioned by the World War and domestic problems, our Congress, because of the necessity of solving special questions, has been compelled to meet in extra session almost continuously to dispose of its regular work.

The last Congress had before it approximately 20,000 bills, besides resolutions, treaties, and confirmations. The morning hours are devoted to extended committee hearings, so it is very difficult to bring upon the floor for discussion or to pass any measure.

A bill to pass must have behind it public necessity and the pressure of public opinion. It must be one of immediate domestic concern to have a chance of passing.

A measure involving the independence of your islands, setting up the machinery for a change and a new government, will require long discussions and debate. Therefore, there is a tendency not to take up such questions but to pass them to a future period.

So to secure consideration of your national aspiration will require patience and persistence to bring the matter to a vote.

The story of your aspirations can not be told too frequently in America as your opponents are active. In my opinion Congress will deliver its decision upon the opinion it forms of your earnestness. Your own expressions, therefore, will have great weight with it.

You may be encouraged, however, by the fact that for the first time in 15 years a bill in your behalf was favorably reported by the Senate committee.

The sending of a commission to present your cause was very helpful, both before the Congress and outside of it.

Your subject is not one that is all sentiment. In fact, it is a very practical matter. It has its moral side, but practical considerations will be brought forward and I hope that it will be decided upon the basis of common sense.

Your standards will never be identical with our own. There will always be a difference but what may be called the fundamentals are the same.

Your last commission made a most favorable national impression. It acquired experience and brilliantly presented your appeal.

But the personnel of our Congress changes; a new Congress goes into session. There are many new Senators and new Congressmen, and it is important that they should have the advice and opinions of the Filipino people. Information should be readily available; it should be in close touch with our legislative situation. Another commission, with representatives of business and educational interests, should be prepared to furnish facts, information, and to answer questions.

Any uncertainty as to your national attitude, if any now remains, would be dispelled by this commission and American newspapers could make their own inquiries direct from your authorized representatives and not be compelled to rely upon flashes from Manila.

PROSPECTS FOR INDEPENDENCE

What are our prospects for independence? is the question most frequently asked of men. I can only give my opinion.

First. The American people know the islands belong to you. It is your land, your blood, your bone, your inheritance, and its government your ultimate responsibility.

Second. Distance and climate will never make the Philippines a place of permanent colonization for Americans.

Third. Yours is an agricultural country. There are millions of uncultivated farm acres in America awaiting development.

Fourth. Your native population of Malays is rapidly increasing, and although under American sovereignty for over 30 years the American residential population in your islands is decreasing.

Fifth. If your united national aspirations for independence are withheld, it will breed unhappiness and discontent which liberty loving Americans will not permit.

Sixth. American participation in the World War to assist the European nations to secure the right of self-determination in Europe is too recent to permit its national conscience to deny the same right to an oriental people.

Seventh. Because our national promise of independence has been given to you our national honor will compel fulfillment.

Eighth. No Congress can legally bind a succeeding Congress for a long period of years, and the present destructive uncertainty to both American and Philippine interests can only be settled by independence.

Ninth. Because I believe you will, by orderly, peaceful persuasion, convince Americans of the justice of your cause.

There are economic and military consideration which will naturally suggest themselves, but it is largely because of these elemental and fundamental considerations that I believe your national aspirations will be granted.

When America retires from your islands it is my hope that there will always remain the memory of good deeds and practical accomplishments for your welfare, and in our country a justifiable pride in the period of our trusteeship.

The truth of what has happened here will reach America. For truth has the faculty of ultimately entering into the understanding of our people. One of our great American Presidents, Abraham Lincoln, wisely said:

"You can fool all of the people some of the time, and some of the people all of the time, but you can not fool all of the people all of the time."

I have caught some of your enthusiasm; it has given me what Americans call a thrill. My conviction was from the head; now it is from the head and heart, and I leave your islands with a feeling of some sadness, sad because you are so far away I may never return, but I take back with me the fine thought that you unitedly place liberty above every other consideration, economic or financial, the conviction that you will willingly pay a high cost for freedom.

My memory will always retain the benediction given before the bowed heads of 150,000 patriotic people, when Doctor Bocobo, appealing to our God, said:

"Bless Thou every hand that toils and every heart that throbs for freedom. Grant that in the vehemence of our struggles for liberty no ill will or hatred may creep into our hearts."

INTERGOVERNMENTAL INDEBTEDNESS

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in the current number of the Saturday Evening Post is a splendid article by Garet Garrett relating to present economic conditions. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the Saturday Evening Post, December 12, 1931]

OPENING THE GOLDEN GOOSE

To the further education of American credit abroad now enter these autumnal sights and experiences, viz:

First. The gold honor of the American dollar impugned in Europe, where our lending of it had been so prodigal. Our credit impugned by our debtors! And for what reason? For the reason that we had been too free with it; precisely for the reason that our debtors knew they had borrowed too much on poor security.

Second. The rationally impossible spectacle of debtor nations raiding the gold reserves of a creditor nation while the creditor is self-bound under an agreement not to collect its debts from them.

Third. The strange experience of a creditor nation finding itself beholden to one of its principal debtors, the debtor undertaking on grounds of generosity and helpfulness, to stop raiding the creditor's gold reserves short of the point at which the creditor's gold solvency might seem in jeopardy.

Fourth. The sight of public ovations in this the creditor country to the Premier of one of its principal debtors, when he comes to tell us that more of Europe's war debts must be charged to the American taxpayer in a spirit of international friendship; more public ovations as he departs, saying he has our official promise to consider it.

Fifth. Experience of numbness and a sense of ill-being in the body of American credit, probably psychic.

And for all of this, the narrative beginning abruptly.

What with the American moratorium for a year on war-debt payments owing to the United States Treasury, the rueful relending of $700,000,000 or $800,000,000 of short-term American credit in Germany to save her from default, a cash loan at the same time to the Reichsbank, then a cash loan to the Bank of England to save the gold honor of the pound sterling, and immediately another to the British Treasury for the same purpose—with all of this we put no less than $1,500,000,000 of American gold credit into Europe last summer, thinking thereby to avert the disaster of a financial collapse.

The specific intent of our loans to the Bank of England and the British Treasury was to keep the mighty pound sterling on a gold basis—keep it, that is to say, at its full traditional gold value. This the British themselves were heroically resolved to do, for if the Bank of England should be unable to meet its obligations in gold on demand, that would mean inflation, a depreciated British currency no longer worth its face in gold. It would mean, naturally, the humiliation of British credit over the whole world. Nevertheless, this happened. After the Bank of England had borrowed all the American gold credit it could get on its own signature and after the British Treasury had itself borrowed $200,000,000 more in New York in behalf of the Bank of England, the blow finally fell. On September 20 the Bank of England ceased to pay its obligations in gold. The value of the pound sterling immediately declined one-quarter, and Great Britain was on a paper-money basis.

The event may have been inevitable; nevertheless, one of the factors in the situation was the behavior of the French. For a long time they had been accumulating credits in England. That is easily explained. When French goods are sold in England there is a French credit in England. The French may take it home in cash or leave it there as a bank deposit at interest. In the marvelous business of foreign exchange there are many apparently complex transactions which, when stripped of their special language, are all as simple as that one illustration is. Two nations trading together will have balances with each other to pay and to receive, and if one elects to leave its credit balances in the other's country in the form of bank deposits payable on demand, that is all right. It is all right in proportion. But when one nation comes to have very large credit balances in the other's banks there is danger in it for that other country because something may happen to cause the one to want all its money at once in gold, and to want it when it is very inconvenient to pay gold away.

And that is what happened. Those large French balances on deposit in England turned out to be harmful to the Bank of England. Seeing that an enormous amount of British credit, along with American credit, had been trapped in Germany, and that first the Bank of England and then the British Treasury were obliged to borrow gold credit abroad to sustain the gold value of the pound sterling, the French all at once began calling on England to pay them their bank deposits in gold. Holland also had large bank deposits in England; and seeing what the French were doing, the Dutch, too, began calling on England to pay them in gold. Lastly, the British themselves fell into a panic and began individually to convert their private bank balances into gold.

A RUN ON THE BANK OF ENGLAND

Thus there was a run on the Bank of England. As American gold credit borrowed in New York flowed in at one door, other banks, other countries, the British people themselves were taking coin and bullion out by another door. The behavior of the Bank of France was the least understood and the least explained. France did not need the gold. She had already one-quarter of all the monetary gold in the world, much more than England, actually much more than any other country, excepting only the United States; and, relatively, the French gold reserves were greater than ours. The Bank of England could not stand the run. Two weeks after the British Treasury had borrowed $200,000,000 in New York to save the pound sterling the Bank of England suspended gold payments.

Now, with Great Britain off the gold basis, Germany financially frozen, Austria and Hungary bankrupt, all war-debt payments owing by Europe to the United States Treasury suspended for a year, the situation in principle was simply this: That what Europe owed us was payable either in depreciated paper currency or not at all, whereas anything we owed or might owe to Europe was payable in gold on demand, because the United States was still on a gold basis.

Is that clear? Suppose you have at your bank two separate accounts. In one account you owe the bank $1,000,000 on a long-term promissory note which you have undertaken to pay off gradually with interest. The other account is current. You have there a credit, say, of $50,000. That is the account in which you transact your daily business. Now suppose you go to your bank and say: "I can not pay the interest on that $1,000,000 note. I am bankrupt if you make me pay." Saying this, you put yourself in the hands of the bank. It can demand payment and sell you out; it can foreclose on your business and take all your property for debt. But the bank does not want to do that. It says: "All right. These are hard times. Let the interest go for a year and let the note run." You say, "But how about my current account in which I have $50,000? What will you do with that?" The bank says, "Well, of course, you have to go on doing business. We will treat that account as if you were solvent. Go on drawing your checks against it as before and keep your business going. All this will work out in time."

A reasonable arrangement. Its element is grace. But suppose the next day you walk into that bank and say, "I'm afraid of this institution. It's too loose with its credit. My current account may not be safe. I am closing it out. Here is my check for $50,000, and I want it in gold, please."

That would be difficult behavior on the part of a debtor, owing his bank $1,000,000 on which he is unable to pay the interest, yet demanding $50,000 in gold. The bank, however, having made that arrangement with him, is obliged to pay him his credit balance of $50,000, and pay it in gold if he demands gold, or confess itself insolvent.

Between an individual and his bank such a case would be preposterous. Between Europe and this country it is in the same nature preposterous, though the fact may be somewhat obscured by its own magnitude and by the high language surrounding it.

EUROPE LOOKS TO THE WEST

Owing this country $15,000,000,000—a part of it war debt, the rest of it representing private and public borrowing from American investors and American banks—Europe, nevertheless, had very large credit balances over here, payable on demand. You might put the sum of these balances at $1,000,000,000. They had originated in various ways. While American banks had been putting deposits in European banks—especially German banks, because the rate of interest was high—European banks at the same time had been putting deposits in American banks for an opposite reason. They wanted safety. So there were credit balances of that character, payable to Europe on demand. Then European exporters had been in the habit of leaving their profits on deposit in American banks, thinking the money was safer here than in Europe, especially German exporters, who were quite right. More or less for the same reason private European capitalists had been sending money to New York to be employed in short-term paper which they could sell at a moment's notice. And some of Europe's credit balances in this country were simply the untouched proceeds of recent American loans, even the ambulance loans we had made in the summer to avert a financial collapse in Europe. And now, what happened to these European credit balances, or, rather, what they did to us, is what we are about to see.

The Bank of England suspended gold payments for the reason, at the very last, that as fast as the New York banks could write in their books, "Item, gold credit set aside for the Bank of England on the security of her promissory notes," the European raiders ran to the Bank of England and took the actual gold away, in coin and bullion. The Bank of England in that case was a sieve. When the New York banks stopped writing that item down in their books—"Item, gold credit set aside for the Bank of England"—then immediately the Bank of England stopped paying out her own gold to anybody. She decided, instead, to hoard what was left.

What followed was a revelation in the abnormal possibilities of international finance. Europe looked westward. The historic habit. For nearly four and a half centuries she has been looking westward for gold. There lay the great American gold reserve—$5,000,000,000 of it—exposed and unprotected. She had keys to it. The keys were those credit balances in New York banks, payable in gold on demand. And where these balances represented, as some of them did, the untouched proceeds of recent American loans to Europe, the keys she had to the American gold reserve were keys we had unwittingly handed away.

The American gold reserve was defenseless. There was no way to stop Europe from using those keys, no matter how she had got hold of them. We were foreclosed from making such demands upon Europe as would offset her demands upon us for gold.

True, we had enormous bank balances in Europe, but these were either frozen, as in Germany, or now payable in paper money. In no case could we get gold for them. But Europe could demand all her credit balances in New York to be paid forthwith in gold.

True, Europe was owing to the United States Treasury $250,000,000 a year on account of her war debts, and that would have been a large offset against her demands upon us for gold, but we had granted her a 1-year moratorium on that obligation; wherefore it was no offset at all.

True, we had immense investments in Europe, principally in Germany, but if we sold them we could not get gold for them, whereas German investments in this country could be sold and converted at once into gold.

True, we could sell dollars in Germany or dollars in London, but we could not get gold for them; whereas Germany could sell paper marks in New York and get gold for them; England could sell paper pounds in New York and get gold for them.

ONE-WAY GRACE

The curious and final illustration would be this: That a British holder of a pound-sterling note could not go to his own Bank of England and get gold for it, but he could send it to New York, sell it in the foreign-exchange market, and take the proceeds in gold. A gold-money country must be prepared to honor every kind of paper obligation, not in gold equivalent, not in gold credit, not in something that may be sold somewhere else for gold, but in the gold itself, when, if and as the gold is demanded; and it must do this without demur or hesitation. Therefore, the only protection a gold country has against a run on its gold reserve is to be steadily receiving from its debtors as much as it pays out all together; its income from foreign countries must equal its outgo to foreign countries, for otherwise it will lose its gold.

But we had relieved our debtors. We had eased them of their obligations to us without limiting in any way our obligations to them. One-way grace. Thus the abnormality that owing us $15,000,000,000 in the form of public debt on which we had granted a 1-year moratorium and in the form of private debt on which we could get nothing in gold even where it was not in default, in the form of overdue short-term credits in Germany and Austria which we had agreed not to demand payment of, and in the form of bank balances all over Europe that were simply frozen—owing us all this, Europe nevertheless could demand payment forthwith, and payment in gold, of all her credit balances in New York, amounting to $1,000,000,000, more or less. And we were obliged either to give up the gold or leave the gold basis ourselves. If we refused the gold in a single case, that instant we were off the gold standard.

How preposterous. Debtors owing us in all manner of ways much more than they can pay, themselves protected by grace, by moratorium, or by insolvency, are yet able to descend upon the American gold reserve and deplete it wholesale. During July and August Europe swallows up $1,500,000,000 of American gold credit, much of it without security, simply because she is in despairing need of it; in September she is making a run on the American bank system for gold, and the American bank system is helpless.

We were complacently prepared to lose some gold. We were thinking of Europe and her problems and of ways in which we might help to build England back to the gold standard. One way of helping would be to set no obstacles against a natural movement of gold from this country to Europe. We were willing to sell and lend her all the gold we could spare. But we were not prepared for a raid. Not only did Europe demand her deposits with American banks to be paid immediately in gold; she began selling out her short-term American investments, even her American bonds and stocks, and to demand the proceeds of these in gold, and this at a time when our own internal liquidation was running at flood and the whole American banking structure was under a terrific strain. One of the principal reasons for our own internal liquidation was the frozen and moribund condition of American investments in Europe. For example, American banks were obliged to sell high-class American bonds, even Government bonds, because their enormous assets in Europe, especially in Germany, could not be liquidated. Now, on top of it all comes this selling of American things by Europe with but one idea, and that is to get the proceeds in gold.

COMPARATIVE FIGURES ON GOLD

In six weeks we lost $750,000,000 of coin and bullion, and that was nearly one-sixth of our entire stock of monetary gold. In less than a year, at that rate, we should be bare of it. And it was not simply that Europe's need for this gold was greater than ours, not that the mere possession of it would cure any of her economic ills. The raid was motivated much more by fear and panic than by any economic necessity; and yet that was not all. Europe wanted the gold for its own sake, while she could get it. The gold itself. The power of possessing it. The American gold. The temptation was irresistible.

This strange phase of the situation was presently made clear by the daily figures on where it was going. England did need gold; there was no doubt of that. But to our astonishment England was not getting it. Of the $750,000,000 we lost out of the American reserve in the first six weeks, France alone took more than one-half—nearly, if not quite, two-thirds—and she did not need it at all, for already she had actually more gold in her possession than any other country, save only the United States, and relatively more than we ourselves possessed. This statement has occurred before. It will be convenient at this point to give the data.

When the Bank of England suspended gold payments our gold stock of monetary gold was $5,000,000,000; the French stock was $2,330,000,000. But our population is threefold that of France; our national wealth may be easily five or six fold greater. Therefore, France had more gold than this country in proportion to her economic weight and rank. Our stock of monetary gold was less than $42 per capita; hers was more than $57 per capita. Yet it was France that led the run on the American gold reserve.

Why did she want the gold? Was she fearful that the United States would abandon the gold standard? If so, did that fear seize her all at once?

In any case all that France could do with the gold would be to hoard it, and for that purpose she has built since the war a treasure chamber unique in the world. Every country, of course, has a massive burglarproof vault for its gold reserve. But France decided to make one so deep and strong and mysterious that not even a victorious modern army could break into it. You might blow the Bank of France away with bombs and its gold would be all the safer. The chamber is 2½ acres big; it lies 200 feet deep in the earth. Over it, first, is 40 feet of water, which is a lake they made by damming the subterranean river that flows beneath Paris, and then above the water 50 feet of solid rock. The way to it is through six steel towers with revolving doors moved by electric engines, and the passage of descent can be flooded at a moment's notice.

At the signal of alarm a detail of defenders would instantly vanish through this passage, pull the water in after them, and be forgotten—safely forgotten for an indefinite time, or for the duration of the war, because everything has been thought of beforehand. They would find in the gold chamber a kitchen, provisions enough for two or three arctic expeditions, dishes, linen, beds, all the facilities for comfortable housekeeping.

Beginning on or about September 20, every fast ship from New York for French ports carried gold on its way to this hiding place. The same fast ships or others carried gold also for Holland, Switzerland, Belgium, Italy, and Germany. Even Germany, where $700,000,000 or $800,000,000 of American money was frozen in the form of bank balances and overdue short-term credits—even Germany could take gold from New York.

THE CAMPAIGN AGAINST THE DOLLAR

To lose $750,000,000 of gold coin and bullion in six weeks, with no saying when or where the run would end and no way of stopping it, was a very serious matter for this country, especially in view of its own condition of internal stress. No country, under any conditions, could lose gold at that rate or in that proportion for long and hold to the gold standard. That would be true if, to begin with, it had exactly all the gold in the world. We had only ourselves to blame. One-way grace; no means of self-protection reserved. Caught by our gold heel in a trap we had built for ourselves. We made it and walked straight in. It was not inevitable that we should have exposed our gold reserve, without protection, to an unlimited foreign attack. Once we had done it, however, the attack, all the natural consequences, were inevitable. But this is not to say the total of Europe's behavior was only such as we might have expected. Who could have foreseen that parallel to the raid on the American gold reserve there would run in Europe a campaign of rumor, innuendo, and propaganda against the value of the American dollar? That also happened, and it certainly was not inevitable—not even from our naïve point of view.

As the Bank of France took gold from New York, rumors of an imminent financial collapse in the United States spread throughout Europe, and the French papers kept saying with one sound that the franc was the sound gold money of the world. Then came the news that President Hoover had called upon American bankers to mobilize the credit resources of the American banking system against the tide of liquidation that was running in New York—much of it foreign liquidation in order to produce gold for Europe—and instantly, upon the raw news, without waiting for details, it was said in France that the United States had entered the path to inflation. This was the beginning of the end of the gold dollar. Would the people now believe it? The franc was the good gold money of the world.

THE DOLLAR DECLINES IN EUROPE

Immediately in all the financial capitals of Europe the value of the American dollar declined. In Poland, where the dollar had been for years a standard unit of value, serving even as security for the Polish currency, there was a dollar panic. The New York Times correspondent at Warsaw cabled October 9:

"A flight from the dollar started here this morning on the heels of alarming reports from Paris that the United States Government had decided to abandon the gold standard and that an increase in the issue of dollar notes was being discussed in Washington."

In one day the Polish people, remembering what inflation was like, sold 1,000,000 American dollars to the Bank of Warsaw at 99 cents. The panic lasted several days, and then subsided in a bewildered realization that the Paris rumors were false.

The British campaign was led by the Rothermere newspapers, which have a combined daily circulation of 5,000,000. Day after day these papers printed under big headlines the editorial opinion that the downfall of American credit was at hand, together with the exhortation to sell dollars and dollar securities while yet there was time to convert them into gold. Examples:

"BRING YOUR MONEY BACK TO BRITAIN

"Advices from America indicate a serious state of affairs. This, therefore, offers a favorable moment to sell dollar securities and bring back the money to this country."

Again:

"SELL DOLLAR AND FRANC SECURITIES

"Don't be trapped. When the break on Wall Street comes, the reaction may be far-reaching."

Another day:

"WHO WILL GO OFF THE GOLD STANDARD NEXT?

"The American banking position shows no sign of improvement."

And so on, in such taste and meaning, day after day, with $350,000,000 of American gold credit freshly trapped in the Bank of England and in the British Treasury.

The financial nerves of the world are taut. They have been plucked and frayed to the snapping point. All the shapes of insolvency are dim. At this moment the Premier of France must pay a visit to the President of the United States to examine with him the problems of the world and explore all solutions.

What is it France wants? We already know in principle, even in some particulars, what she wants. First, she wants to get rid of her war debts to the United States Treasury. She wishes the American Government to forgive her these debts and charge them to the American taxpayer. At the same time she wants to continue receiving reparations from Germany. Therefore she wants to save the Young plan, which Germany, England, and many Americans, too, have taken for dead since the London conference last summer, especially since the report of the Wiggin committee of experts. The reason why she wants to save the Young plan is that it stipulates for certain large unconditional annuities to be paid by Germany to France before anyone else shall receive reparations at all. She does not want the Hoover war-debt holiday to be extended beyond its year; she prefers to be receiving more money from Germany on account of reparations than she pays to the United States Treasury on account of her war debts, as it was before. The holiday had almost cost her $100,000,000 a year, which was the excess of her German reparations over her payments to the United States Treasury; and it would have cost her that if she had not demanded special treatment as a preferred German creditor. Then in principle, of course, France wants anything else that will increase her power and prestige in the world.

THE FRENCH CREDITS IN AMERICA

What has any of this to do with the gold crisis? Well, what it all has to do with the gold crisis now immediately appears.

With the Premier of France on the high seas in this direction and with the newspapers running big headlines on the momentous nature of his visit and what France wants, and will she get it, suddenly we are astonished by the news that the Bank of France has notified the American banking system that France can not afford to leave her credit balances in New York any longer unless the rate of interest is raised. If the rate of interest is not raised, she will feel obliged to call the remainder of her credit balances home. And the remainder of these credit balances is $600,000,000.

This is as the news appeared in the New York Times on the morning of October 20:

"The Bank of France, which has about $600,000,000 of short-term balances in this market, yesterday notified New York banks that the 1½ per cent rate of interest now being paid on foreign central-bank deposits by local institutions was unsatisfactory. The French bank of issue indicated that unless a higher rate was provided it would seek other employment for its huge dollar balances.

"The French demand for a higher rate of interest, carrying with it the implied threat of withdrawal of French dollar balances in the form of gold, aroused a mixed reaction in Wall Street. Some bankers, who interpreted the move as an attempt to dictate to this market the terms under which France would refrain from recalling her money, flatly declared that they were willing to see the funds go. They said, despite the heavy gold losses recently sustained by the country, the United States had nothing to fear from such action on the part of France and much to gain by getting rid of an unwieldy obligation that, under other circumstances, might prove embarrassing. Other important bankers expressed the belief that the Bank of France would be satisfied with a slightly higher rate, possibly 2 per cent, and were inclined to stress this viewpoint as an indication that amicable arrangements for maintaining French balances here intact could be reached."

Firstly, the figure was astounding. For a long time France had been doing here what she did in England, namely, accumulating enormous credit balances. The amount of them was much more than we realized, much more than Wall Street itself knew, since, of course, they were not all in one place.

PROTECTED BY OUR MORATORIUM

Secondly, what did these French credit balances represent? Besides the normal proceeds of trade left on deposit with American banks, they represented, (a) dollar checks cashed by American tourists in France, and (b) American money loaned to Germany to pay reparations to France. These transactions are easily understood. As the French banks cashed the dollar checks of American tourists they took credit for them in American banks. This credit in American banks was gold credit; therefore the Bank of France treated it as gold reserve, as if it were gold actually in hand, and issued French currency against it for circulation in France. And the same way with American credit loaned to Germany to pay reparations. The Germans transferred it to France on the books of American banks, and the French left it here at interest.

Thirdly, how oblique that France, our debtor, owing us in one pocket $3,750,000,000 on which she is paying us this year nothing, may yet demand $600,000,000 of gold out of another pocket! She has that right. If she insists, we shall have to give her the gold. But she can do this only because her payments to the United States Treasury are suspended for a year by grace of an American moratorium.

Fourthly, such a thing as the central bank of one country serving notice on the banking system of another country that because the rate of interest is too low, or for any reason, it may feel obligated to call its aggregate credit balances away in gold, was hitherto unheard of. No one could have imagined it. That is not the way it happens in the normal course of international finance. Credit balances are continually shifting. If the rate of interest is higher in New York than in London, credit balances move automatically to New York; or if the rate of interest is higher in London, they shift from New York to London, and nothing is ever said about it. The only news of it will be in the bank statistics.

Now, the Bank of France very well knew that suddenly to lose $600,000,000 more gold, on top of what we had already lost to Europe—and the bulk of it to France—would create a grave situation in this country. And mark this: If the French themselves believed what they had been saying in Europe about the dollar and about the American financial situation in general, they must have believed that a demand upon New York for $600,000,000 more gold all at once would pitch this country off the gold standard. Well, of course, in that event—in the event of the dollar going the way of the pound sterling—then the French franc assuredly would be the premier gold money and govern the world of finance.

Did she mean it? That is a very interesting question. As a proposition in pure finance you would suppose that if the Bank of France had really meant to call away her $600,000,000 credit balances in gold she would not have been so stupid as to announce her whole intention beforehand. Any village banker would know better. Actually, therefore, the Bank of France was probably bluffing. The Bank of France is to France what the Bank of England is to Great Britain. In finance it is France. Therefore, it would have been France that was bluffing, and this carries it at once beyond finance into high politics.

Under pretense of being dissatisfied with the rate of interest in New York, the Bank of France revealed to us, to Europe, to the whole world, the amazing fact that France almost had the power, if not quite, to throw the American banking system off the gold standard! To send the American dollar after the pound sterling!

That was something for the Premier of France to have in his hand when he should begin to examine the problems of the world and explore solutions with Mr. Hoover in the White House. But it was at the same time a revelation in no way calculated to relieve the tension then existing here and elsewhere or to check the hoarding of gold by individuals—a dread movement that was already world-wide and threatening to become uncontrollable.

There were some very anxious moments in Washington. Public utterances were guarded and hushed, lest something should get said out loud to offend the feelings of France. What would Wall Street do? What could it do? If it were willing to raise the rate of interest, on the ultimatum of the Bank of France, still, to do so would be to acknowledge the power of France. But if it refused, then what would happen? Would France really demand the gold?

WALL STREET STANDS FIRM

But there was only one right thing for Wall Street to say. May it be long remembered to the credit of Wall Street that it did say it. To this effect: "We pay here the New York rate of interest, whatever that may be. If France wants her credit balances, let her take them. If she demands them in gold, the gold will be ready."

The right honorable Financial Chronicle, with its Biblical prestige in Wall Street, said:

"The move was resented as an attempt to bring financial pressure to bear on the United States after the fashion that has been followed from time to time in recent European political maneuvers.

"Bankers here are confident that the country has nothing to fear from such a move, provided the American people themselves remain undisturbed. We think this is a proper attitude for our banking institutions to take. France contributed in no unimportant degree to the financial breakdown in Germany by withdrawing large amounts of short-term credits which it had employed in that country, its action then being followed by general withdrawal of credits and deposits by other foreign governments. It was then supposed that its purpose was mainly political. But later it began also to indulge in withdrawals of capital and of funds from Great Britain, though when the French bank became alarmed as to the possible consequences it once more began to cooperate and to extend new credits to the Bank of England and to Great Britain. But it was now too late to save Great Britain from suspension of gold payments.

"In like manner France is now engaged in huge withdrawals from New York, though we can not get ourselves to believe that the Bank of France has any ulterior purpose in doing this. At all events, the effect has been to create a feeling of distrust all over Europe and to lead to large withdrawals here by other important European countries, and more particularly Holland, Belgium, and Switzerland. In these circumstances the best course is unquestionably to ignore all threats—if such have really been made—and to let France do her worst if she is really bent on doing so."

Any other way of speaking to the Bank of France would have stultified American credit in the eyes of the world. The effect of that way of speaking was immediate. In all foreign financial capitals the dollar rose to new prestige and its value increased. When the disordered events of 1931 come to be viewed in perspective, it may well appear that Wall Street's strong-minded behavior at this point was of crucial importance, not only to this country but to a world that needed more than anything else just then a point of stability whereon to rest its confidence.

THE GOLD TIDE TURNS

So it turned out that when the Premier of France landed in New York the matter of a withdrawal of the French credits had been settled, and Laval pledged France to assist the United States in maintaining the gold standard.

In the joint statement issued from the White House on October 25 by President Hoover and Premier Laval this paragraph occurred:

"Particularly we are convinced of the importance of monetary stability as an essential factor in the restoration of normal economic life in the world, in which the maintenance of the gold standard in France and the United States will serve as a major influence."

And what would be the French contribution to the monetary stability of the world? What would France do to assist the United States in maintaining the gold standard? This, to wit: Pending a reexamination of her war debt to the United States Treasury, pending, further, a reexamination of Germany's capacity to pay under the Young plan, which makes France the preferred creditor, France would make no more abnormal demands upon the American gold reserve.

In his news report of the Hoover-Laval conversations, the Washington correspondent of the New York Times, October 26, wrote:

"In a cautious way, the joint statement made known that President Hoover and Premier Laval had determined that their two Governments should stand together in the maintenance of the gold standard. * * * Among the things accomplished were the assurance by Premier Laval that abnormal movements of gold from New York would be stopped, and that reexamination of Germany's capacity to pay reparations should be made under the existing provisions of the Young plan, with the United States deferring action on a survey of European debts to this Government to determine the capacity of debtor nations to pay until after a Young plan committee had reported on Germany's financial position."

Again in the same dispatch:

"Premier Laval made known that steps had been taken * * * to stop the flow of gold from New York to France."

Then the news of reflection, New York Times, October 28, from Washington:

"Two days after the results of the conversations between President Hoover and Premier Laval were announced in a rather colorless and unilluminating communiqué, a considerable Washington reaction is that beyond the mutual measures taken for the preservation of the gold standard, the stabilization of international exchange and the stoppage of abnormal shipments of gold from New York to France, the United States obtained no immediate concrete benefits from the Franco-American exchanges."

"Abnormal" is a strange word to be appearing in respect of the demands of one nation upon the gold reserves of another. In respect of the demands of a debtor nation upon the gold reserves of its creditor it grows stranger. And that the debtor should be able to oblige the creditor nation by undertaking to make no abnormal demands upon its gold reserves is more than strange. Why any possibility of abnormal demands by France upon the American gold reserves?

Then, again, what is abnormal? Did M. Laval mean abnormal in principle, perhaps? He sailed away on Monday, October 26. On that day the Bank of France took $20,000,000 more gold from New York, on Tuesday $18,000,000, but on Wednesday only $3,500,000. Yet $41,500,000 gold in three days is certainly a great deal. However, there were signs by then that the tide was beginning to turn. Still losing gold heavily to France, we were again receiving gold at the same time, because the dollar at last was taking to mind its own welfare, and the world's confidence in American credit was rising.

A gold country is like a bank. Its first responsibility is to itself, for the integrity of its money, its credit, and its assets, and if it suffers its view of this principle to be overcome by a sense of responsibility to others, no matter with what intention, it will fail the others because it has failed itself. It is the natural law, and there is no other.

In one of the bad moments last October a member of the Federal Reserve Board was heard saying: "Not only is this the worst financial crisis in all history. Something is missing that was always there before. All over the world there is this sense of something missing, like a familiar rock, an immovable point, a wheel of balance. And what is it? The Bank of England is missing. The authority of the pound sterling is missing. The value of the pound sterling itself is uncertain, changing from hour to hour. We never had that to contend with before."

So it was. And that is why the suspension of gold payments by the Bank of England was an appalling financial event. No longer was the pound sterling worth $4.86 in gold anywhere in the world. No longer was it the universal unit of value in which all other things were priced. For now it was that the pound sterling itself had to be priced in other things—in American dollars, for example. Then suppose the same thing should happen to the dollar, which had recently become the next most stable unit of value in the world's opinion. Suppose the dollar, instead of being worth 100 cents in gold anywhere in the world, should have to be priced at 90 cents, 80 cents, 70 cents, in terms of something else, maybe the French franc.

The long and familiar preeminence of the pound sterling as a universal unit of value in any kind of financial weather, war only excepted, had been worth to Great Britain an income of $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 a year from the rest of the world in the form of banking profit, meaning discounts, commissions, interest, and fees. Preeminence of the American dollar in the trade and exchange of the world in place of the pound sterling would be worth $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 a year to this country. Or, if such preeminence passed to the French franc, it would be worth $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 a year to France.

THE OLD PREEMINENCE OF THE POUND

So you may see what was involved as between the dollar and the franc, merely in terms of national income; you may see also what Great Britain had lost.

When the British say it was a good thing for England to leave the gold standard, they mean only that it was good for England that she embraced a bitter necessity in time. Now she will work harder, trade harder, spend less, live a little less, until she is quite solvent again. Her export of goods will increase for several reasons. They will be priced in the depreciated pound sterling, which means they will be cheaper for the world to buy, or, to say it another way, other people's gold money will buy more in England than before. Prices will rise in England, but probably not so much as the value of the pound sterling declines outside; as prices rise in England real wages will fall, wherefore the labor cost of producing British goods will fall, and so will the standard of living in England, temporarily at least. And this must happen to any country that loses the integrity of its money.

True, some British economists are saying it was not England that failed the gold standard; it was the gold standard that failed the world. Therefore, they say, the world may do well to try something in place of the gold standard. This is a novel way of thinking in England; elsewhere it is very old. Putting the blame on money! If England had not lost her hold on the gold standard she would be the last to say the gold standard had not been working—in a remorseless manner, to be sure, yet, nevertheless, working as it should—in the past three years. If she had not lost her hold on it and other countries were losing theirs, the Bank of England would be saying: "This is hard, but it is the way the gold standard works." It would be a grim thing to say, a selfish thing, perhaps, and yet quite right. For how did the pound sterling come to have preeminence throughout the world in the first place? Its prestige was from the fact that the British had always a primary sense of their responsibility to themselves; that is to say, again, for the integrity of their own money and their own credit; and it turned out, as the law is, that the more jealous they were in this first sense of responsibility to themselves the more certain they were not to fail the world in their responsibilities to it, including the responsibility to keep the balance wheel running true. Thus the pound sterling became a symbol of stability that was a great asset to the whole world.

The best answer to anything the British may now be saying against the gold standard is that, whatever they say or seem to be thinking, all their behavior is governed by an imperious resolve to work themselves back to it by any sacrifice of immediate comfort.

The true meaning of the gold standard is not gold, any more than the value of a piece of paper money is in the quality of the engraving. The true meaning of it is a convention, and the faith of that convention must be kept, not in gold but in credit. Gold is the accidental figure in which the convention is embodied. It might be almost anything else, except that after long experience it was found that gold served better than anything else, merely as the figure. Once it was silver. The pound sterling originally was a pound of silver. The American dollar was originally silver.

Yet when that was true—when the figure was silver—the convention was the same; so also were the penalties for breaking the faith, only not so calamitous, because the great mechanism of money, credit, and exchange, in which all modern wealth is revolved more and more each year, controls the rhythms of human welfare down to the lowest chord.

The value of gold is arbitrary; so is the length of a yardstick. But just as it is necessary to sell cloth by the yard or coal by the ton, so it is necessary to have some arbitrary unit of value in which to price the yard of cloth and the ton of coal. It would be ideal to have something of absolutely invariable value in which to price them. But there is no absolutely invariable thing in the world.

The relative constancy of the gold supply, the durability of the metal, the fact that over the centuries the amount of human exertion necessary to get it out of the rocks changes very slowly—for these and other reasons gold is the least instable thing man has found for purposes of money, hence his preference for it.

Once the quantity of it was important merely as money. That is no longer true. The actual quantity existing is very small. Yet if the mechanism of credit and exchange were perfect and all people could be trusted by themselves and by one another to keep the convention, 1 ton of it—1 ounce of it, in fact—would serve the modern purpose.

THE CONVENTION OF GOLD

One of the singular characteristics of gold is its extensibility. Between two pieces of fine leather made from the intestines of an ox it may be beaten to the impalpable thickness of one three-hundred-thousandths of an inch, so that 1 troy grain may be made to cover 56 square inches. On the number of pure gold leaves 4 by 7 inches that could be beaten from 1 ounce, worth $20.60, you could print the Old Testament in the ordinary Bible type, if the leaves would bear printing. The ancient goldbeater's art may astonish the senses. More astonishing to the imagination is the extensibility of gold in a nonexistent dimension.

Out of this same tame and friendly metal men have beaten a pure fiction of gold, the very spirit of it, and this fiction or spirit is infinitely extensible and infinitely divisible. The gross name for it is credit. The business of extending and dividing the spirit of gold—the business, that is to say, of creating credit and setting it free—is in the hands of bankers, banking systems and governments, and the convention—namely, the true meaning of the gold standard—is simply their undertaking that the amount of credit to be created and set free shall bear a certain relation, called a ratio, to the amount of actual gold in their possession. The ratio is variable from time to time. If and as the business of the world increases faster than the gold supply, so that there is really a need for more money and credit, the ratio may be raised. It is not the ratio itself that is so all-important, as many people think; especially debtors who are always wanting cheap money with which to pay their debts, or, on the other hand, creditors whose advantage is in dear money. The imperatives are simple, and three: First, that there shall be some definite ratio; second, that it shall have been agreed upon when we were all in our right minds; third, that we hold to it in good faith.

CREDIT REPRESENTS DEBT

For this now is the modern function of gold—to limit the amount of money and credit that may be willfully, irresponsibly created and set free. Organized credit is, relatively, a strange thing in the economic life. New and experimental forms of it are continually being invented and we love to deceive ourselves with them. We forget that credit in any form represents debt in some other form. We know about ourselves that we have seizures of ecstasy and mass delusion; that again a time may come when the temptation to throw the monetary machine into wild motion so that everybody may become infinitely rich by means of infinite debt will rise to the pitch of mania, as it did, for example, in 1928 and 1929. With this intelligent knowledge of ourselves we make bargains beforehand with reason; we agree that money, credit, and debt shall not be inflated beyond a certain ratio to gold, under certain penalties such as we shall be very loath to pay, and yet such as we can not refuse to pay under worse penalties still.

So long as the convention is reasonably kept in the faith of credit nobody wants gold. People know what the fiction is. They may read for themselves in the published figures of the bank that its liabilities exceed its gold ten or twenty fold, and yet they feel no anxiety about the gold value of their deposits. They may read for themselves in the figures from the Public Treasury that the gold reserve is only one-half or one-third as much as the amount of paper money in circulation. Yet they will treat that paper money as if it were gold. Nobody would dream of supposing that a country, no matter how rich, could redeem its bonds all at once in gold. Yet its bonds will be treated as if they were gold, and one who happens to want gold for them may freely have it. All so long as the convention is kept.

Does this mean, as some of the silly textbooks used to say, that we are all gambling upon a mythical law of averages? No. It means a very definite thing. It means that if every kind of physical wealth were priced in gold, all in one moment of inventory, the aggregate value of it would not be less than the total amount of money, credit, and debt outstanding against it. Then all the money is as good as gold, all the credit is gold credit, and gold itself is a nuisance in the pocket.

But let the faith be broken, let the delusion arise that the fiction is the reality, let the limit upon the amount of credit that shall be set free be left to imagination, and presently there is no way of telling what anything is worth by pricing it. For a while this difficulty of not knowing what anything is worth but inflames the ecstasy. Everything will be priced higher and higher to make sure it is high enough; there will be the illusion that things are becoming dear and scarce. They seem to be dear because the value of the money and credit in which they are priced is falling; they will seem to be scarce because people are buying in the expectation that prices will go higher and higher still.

Suddenly doubt, then coming awake, then panic. The spirit of gold has been debased by senseless inflation. The faith is lost. All with one impulse people rush to seize the gold itself as the only reality left—not only people as individuals; banks also, and the great banking systems and governments do it, in competition with their own depositors and their own people. This is the financial crisis. All of it has happened. It was not the gold standard that did it; it was breaking faith with the gold standard that did it, and the case would be the same if the standard were anything else.

In this country had taken place an increase of actual and potential wealth so sudden, in many ways so unexpected, altogether so prodigious, that we lost our heads.

The reality was not enough. We got the delusion that American credit was inexhaustible. One aspect of the delusion was an acute anxiety in Wall Street lest it should become impossible to invent new forms of debt fast enough to absorb the new forms of credit.

Then many unsound ideas about what credit was for and what it would do. One was the idea that it not only could but was somehow obliged to solve the problems of Europe. We had come new to the business of world creditorship, with no experience in it, no philosophy of it that was our own. Europe read us endless lectures on the obligations of a world creditor, always with emphasis upon its obligation to keep its credit at the call of debtor nations. For otherwise how should the debtors keep going or ever be able to repay what they had already borrowed? We did not forget the law that the first responsibility of a creditor nation is to itself, and that if it fails in this it fails the world. We had never learned it. If now we comprehend it, the frightful cost of educating American credit abroad has not been wholly wasted.

CONSERVATION OF WILD LIFE

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

The Chief Clerk read by title the bill (S. 263) to insure adequate supplies of wild life, plant and animal, including forests, fish, and game, for the people of the United States; to secure the correlation and most economical conduct of wild-life research and restocking and the elimination of duplication of effort and expense between the several departments of the Federal Government having to do with the same; to promote the development and extension of experimental stations for breeding; to promote studies of diseases and other factors limiting the natural supply; and for other purposes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to ask one of the sponsors of this bill about a particular paragraph of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has not as yet been read. Does the Senator wish to ask the question before the bill shall have been read?

Mr. REED. No; I thought it had been reached on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been reached, but the bill has not as yet been read.

Mr. REED. It was discussed at some length yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; it was discussed before it was read. The Senator, however, may proceed with his question.

Mr. REED. I should like to see the bill made the unfinished business, and to that end I move that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That may not be done before 2 o'clock.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the bill going over?

Mr. REED. Yes. I object to its going over.

Mr. President, in section 5 of the bill I notice this provision:

> In the event that any department of the United States Government has for disposal any lands that are of no further use to such department for the purpose or purposes for which such areas were acquired—

And so on. Then there follows a provision that the land shall be offered to the various governmental agencies authorized by Congress to engage in the conservation of wild life. If the United States Government owns a 20-foot lot which has been bought for post-office purposes in the business district of some city, it is certainly rather ridiculous to require the Post Office Department to offer that to the Biological Survey for duck-breeding grounds or a fish hatchery. So I suggest that the Senator who has charge of the bill should consider some modification of that language, so as to make it apply only to lands that have some reasonable suitability for the purposes contemplated.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, of course the intent of that section is that it shall apply only to lands suitable to such purpose; that is, for the raising or for the care of wild life or fishes. If the intent is not sufficiently clear, it can be made clear.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WALCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In that connection I call the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania to the following language in the same section to which he has referred:

> Such areas shall first be offered to other various governmental agencies authorized by Congress to engage in the conservation of wild life, including fishes and forests, to ascertain if such areas are suitable and are desired to be taken under administration by such Federal conservation agencies to assist in carrying out the purposes of this act. Whenever such areas having been so offered shall upon investigation be found to be suitable for these purposes, the administration of such areas shall be transferred to the department or departments requesting such transfer, to be administered in conformity with the purposes of this act, and such lands shall not be subject to other disposal until said lands have been duly offered to and declined by other governmental departments.

I merely point out that the section does not seem to be open to the particular objection implied in the question of the Senator from Pennsylvania, because it does provide for a formal ascertainment and a decision of the question whether the lands to be taken over are suitable for purposes of conservation as contemplated by the bill. It is, however, an unusual provision, a very extraordinary provision.

I have felt—and the burden of proof, in so far as my own judgment is concerned, is upon the sponsors of the bill to change that opinion—that the proper way for Congress to set aside areas for conservation purposes is to define the areas to be so set aside rather than to incorporate a blanket provision which might invite the taking over of areas which are not really suited to the purposes intended, with the thought and purpose in mind of disposing of those areas or of exchanging them for other areas.

In other words, the provision is quite too general to meet with my approval unless it is made clear that it will operate differently from what has been suggested.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WALCOTT. I do.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. I am wondering what rule we are working under. I thought the calendar had just been called, and I asked that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is only one bill on the calendar. If the Senator objects to the bill, it goes over unless it is taken up by motion.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. I am objecting to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over unless taken up by motion.

Mr. WALCOTT. I move to take it up, Mr. President.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is not debatable. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

On a division, the motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill, which had been reported from the Select Committee on Conservation of Wild Life Resources with an amendment.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator having the floor yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WALCOTT. I do.

Mr. HAWES. The Senators from Pennsylvania and Arkansas were asking about a provision of the bill. I should like to have an opportunity to explain why we inserted that provision.

For months during the last summer and the summer before our committee had been investigating what might be called the wild-life resources of our country. We discovered that there were vast acreages in parks, Indian reservations, cut-over lands, and other public acreages, upon which no effort was being made to propagate either fish or game; so we decided that cooperation of the Federal departments would be helpful. This section is not designed to transfer land to a game department, or to create a sanctuary. It is only to put upon this land propagation enterprises of birds and fish and mammals which have been neglected in the past.

Mr. President, I do not believe that the importance of this subject and the interest which people have in it are sufficiently realized. Some time ago the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association conducted an investigation solely for the purpose of ascertaining the relative advertising advantages of different sports. They caused an estimate to be made in 14 of the Southern States in the radius of their publications. I shall not read all of these figures but I shall read those of the State of Alabama.

The hunters and fishermen in Alabama, in round numbers, were 298,000 in number; the baseball fans, 169,000; the football fans, 84,000; the golf players, 63,000; the tennis players, 25,000.

Taking the total of these 14 States, we find that there are 4,420,000 men and women who hunt and fish; 2,426,000 who may be termed baseball fans; 1,218,000 football fans; 900,000 golf players; and 363,000 tennis players. So, taking the total of all the sports put together, the hunters and fishermen in those 14 States number 4,420,876, and the total of those who are interested in the four other forms of outdoor recreation amounts to 4,916,652.

I ask for the insertion in the RECORD of this statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, leave is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PUBLIC INTEREST IN OUTDOOR RECREATION

Reports all agree that instead of the interest in outdoor recreation, hunting and fishing, decreasing, there is a rapid and continuous increase.

For illustration: A representative of the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association, seeking to determine, for the purposes of publicity, the relative news value of hunting and fishing as compared with baseball, football, golf, and tennis, assembled the figures available for 14 of the Southern and Southwestern States. He reports the following results:

State	Hunters and fishermen	Baseball fans	Football fans	Golf players	Tennis players	Total football, golf, tennis, and baseball
Alabama	298,259	169,933	84,966	63,725	25,490	344,114
Arkansas	260,250	128,200	64,100	48,075	19,230	259,605
Florida	173,023	94,200	47,100	34,075	13,630	189,005
Georgia	343,842	211,400	105,700	79,275	31,710	428,085
Kentucky	319,702	169,200	84,600	63,450	25,380	342,630

State	Hunters and fishermen	Baseball fans	Football fans	Golf players	Tennis players	Total football, golf, tennis, and baseball
Louisiana	263,577	128,933	64,466	48,350	19,340	261,089
Mississippi	[1] 275,000	199,374	59,687	44,765	17,906	241,732
Missouri	331,101	234,000	117,000	87,750	35,100	473,850
North Carolina	385,690	193,133	96,566	72,425	28,970	391,094
Oklahoma	352,751	159,800	79,900	59,925	23,970	323,595
South Carolina	264,820	123,000	66,500	46,125	18,450	254,075
Tennessee	270,109	165,666	82,833	62,125	24,850	335,474
Texas	554,453	359,800	179,900	134,925	53,970	728,595
Virginia	328,299	169,733	84,866	63,650	25,460	343,709
Total	4,420,876	2,426,372	1,218,184	908,640	363,456	4,916,652

[1] Estimated; no game and fish department.

These figures clearly demonstrate the interest of the Nation in the great out-of-doors. It is conservatively estimated that there is a 400 per cent increase during the last decade in the number of people who enjoyed the pastimes of hunting and fishing.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HAWES. I do.

Mr. REED. I am in sympathy with the main purposes of the bill; but it does seem to me that section 5 is open to objection, first, for the reason that it imposes an unnecessary formality on the sale of property that is obviously unsuitable, and it is hard enough to sell Government property now anyway. We ought to be able to realize promptly upon unnecessary lands held by the Government.

Certainly the Senator does not want a lot in downtown New York to be offered to the Biological Survey. I am sure that would not be his intention; and yet, as the section stands, we would have to take a lot in downtown New York and offer it to the Biological Survey and get their opinion that it is unsuitable for raising quail before we could go ahead and sell it.

What is the use of putting unnecessary impediments in the way of Government business if, by some modification of the section, we can carry out its real intent?

Then, I think the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has pointed out an even more serious objection, in that the language leaves too much discretion to the bureau officials here in Washington, who might be so absorbed in their own subject that they would want to retain for wild-life breeding land that was very valuable for other purposes, and ought not economically to be so held.

For example, suppose we wanted to sell Camp Meade out here. It is worth a very large amount of money. The head of the Biological Survey might say, "Why, no; I can raise birds there, or a fish hatchery can be established there." He ought not to be allowed to have such valuable land for that purpose. I am quite in sympathy, however, with the Senator's idea of using appropriate lands, wild lands, for this purpose.

Ought not the section to be further considered and modified?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator answers, will he permit a suggestion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HAWES. I do.

Mr. KING. It seems to me we would be violating what many of the representatives of Western States have contended for if this bill were passed in its present form, in that as just indicated, it permits an agency of the Government to make the selection. I think land belonging to the Government ought to be transferred only by and with the consent of Congress.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I intend to offer an amendment to that section, and, if the Senator will pardon me, I should like to make some observations with respect to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield for that purpose?

Mr. HAWES. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, that section of the bill is of particular importance to the Senators from the Western States. The Forestry Service, in its zeal in the discharge of its own duties, of course, has been persistent in endeavoring to include within the forest reserves vast areas of the West, the inclusion of some of these areas in the forest reserves being opposed by the people of the locality. The Forestry Service was so insistent that it became necessary for Congress to pass a bill taking away from the President—and that meant from the Forestry Service—power to include, by order, lands within the forest reserves, reserving to Congress the right to say what lands should or should not be included.

In the West there are great areas that are set apart for Indian reservations, for military reservations, and other purposes of that character. If they are no longer needed for those purposes, they are to be offered to these various departments of the Government—the Forestry Service, for instance—and the Forestry Service immediately takes over the administration of those areas.

Let me illustrate. In my own State Fort Assiniboine, a huge area of 49,000 acres, was abandoned some time ago by the War Department for military purposes. Under this bill it would be offered to the Forestry Service, and that whole area of 49,000 acres, if the Forestry Service desired it, would be added to the forest area of the State of Montana.

Fort Keogh Reservation, almost as extensive, was likewise abandoned. By act of Congress that was created a station for the development of methods of more perfectly utilizing the range for range cattle.

In the case of Fort Assiniboine, 2,000 acres of it, together with buildings, were turned over to the State of Montana for agricultural purposes, and the remainder was opened to homestead settlement.

In the case of Fort William Henry Harrison, an area of about 2,000 acres adjacent to the city of Helena, was abandoned by the War Department for military purposes. That has been turned into a veterans' hospital and is now a flourishing institution for the care of disabled veterans.

Under this bill all of these areas would be offered to the Forestry Service, for instance, and turned over to that department or to the Biological Survey or to some other department.

In that situation of affairs, Mr. President, and in conformity with the policy heretofore expressed by Congress, I shall propose that in line 5, after the word "shall," there be inserted the language "upon approval by the Congress," so that it will read:

Whenever such areas having been so offered shall upon investigation be found to be suitable for these purposes, the administration of such areas shall, upon approval by the Congress, be transferred to the department or departments—

And so forth.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am afraid that would have the effect of slowing up the sale of all Government real estate so as to make it almost impossible to sell a tract of Government land.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I should like to answer the Senator's question of a moment ago, and the questions of the Senator from Arkansas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HAWES. This bill does not contemplate a change of management or a control of these properties. All that it is intended to do, and all the committee believes it will do, will be to utilize certain portions of our great unoccupied areas for the propagation of game and fish.

That does not mean the whole property. For instance, we shall introduce in a short while a bill for the establishment of a game farm. That requires only a thousand acres. All this would do would be to promote propagation of fish and game on the public acreage. There would be no jurisdictional changes. The investment for this purpose would be small, infinitesimal.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Does not the Senator recognize the rule of interpretation of statutes, which would mean that if this bill passes with the language now in it, it will amend existing statutes?

Mr. HAWES. It would amend existing statutes, of course.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I say with deference to the Senator that it would to a certain degree amend existing statutes.

Mr. HAWES. Certainly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. With respect to the power of disposal of the use of the lands referred to in the bill before us.

Mr. HAWES. I would welcome any clarifying amendment which would more thoroughly define our object, which is the temporary use of this land, just like boys on a vacant lot in a city are permitted by the owner of the lot to play baseball on it until it is used for some other purpose. That is all this bill intends, and it does not transfer jurisdiction from the Park Service to the Biological Survey, nor does it change it the other way, or to the Bureau of Fisheries. It leaves the jurisdiction just as it is.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator will understand that I am in hearty sympathy with the purposes of the bill.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, the extended discussions in relation to this bill were not anticipated. The amendments proposed are not objectionable. The work of the Committee on Conservation of Wild Life Resources occupied a great deal of the time of its members, and the continuous work which it has applied to the subject may be responsible for the appearance of this bill as No. 1 on the calendar.

The immensity of the subject to be covered by the committee may be visualized when it is understood that, in addition to the immediate subjects under investigation, it is connected with the matters of flood control, irrigation, reclamation, Government lands, military and naval reservations, public parks, and reforestation. To these may be added international treaties and regulations thereunder; regulations of the Customs Service; prosecutions by the Department of Justice; and actions of other Federal agencies.

The committee had before it for advice and suggestions representatives of each department of the Government who have administration either of direct or related activities.

It held extensive hearings, received suggestions, and personally visited wide sections of the central and extreme West, and on the Canadian border, holding hearings and taking testimony. On account of lack of time it was possible to visit but a small portion of our Nation, neglecting for the time other important and interesting sections which will require special study and consideration.

As the work of the committee proceeded, the magnitude of the subject has developed. The information so far obtained is but a small part of that necessary to complete the directed undertaking of the committee.

It will require at least two years, probably longer, to complete its investigations and recommendations, but its inquiry so far has established the vital part in health, national revenue, industrial investment, and recreational value that the preservation and restoration of American wild life holds for the Nation.

Your committee found convincing evidence of a rapid disappearance of wild life. The evidence supporting this conclusion comes from every source. It is not disputed.

Both National and State sources of information agree, and substantiation comes from conservation and sportsmen's organizations, from manufacturers and dealers, from research bureaus and statisticians.

The alarm of the conservationist, sportsman, fisherman, recreationist, and hunter has never been greater than at the present period. The rapid disappearance of wild life is proclaimed by the great newspapers of the Nation and by the smallest local publication. This alarm is supported by all of the Government experts who have appeared before your committee and by reports received from the conservation commissions of the 48 States.

There is unity of opinion on this subject. It is a matter which is not disputed, nor are the complaint and alarm sectional in character; it comes from every part of our country.

Happily for America, but contributing materially to this disappearance of wild life, we find that the instinct or call for hunting and fishing has not decreased but is constantly increasing. It is an hereditary instinct transmitted from pioneer ancestors.

We find that while there is a steady decrease of game and game fish, there is a corresponding increase in the number of hunters and fishermen.

Outdoor recreation and camping have everywhere increased as the result of the introduction of the motor vehicle, providing opportunities for wholesome recreation to millions of our citizens heretofore denied these blessings.

The principal influences which have been effective in reducing and destroying our wild life, your committee finds, are drainage, deforestation, fire, disease, water pollution, increasing numbers of hunters and fishermen equipped with means for rapid, cheap transportation, and, finally, the extended occupation of land by agriculture and industry. It must be expected that to a considerable degree the original stocks of birds, mammals, and fishes must give way for the predominant needs of our advancing civilization. From the investigations already conducted your committee has reached the positive conclusion that the destructive effects to wild life everywhere, apparently, might have been greatly modified and in many cases actually avoided had a national policy of conservation been adopted earlier by State and Federal Governments. And your committee is also of the opinion that it is not yet too late to formulate and apply such policies with every hope for success, and that the timely inauguration of a sound program will yet insure not merely a maintenance of existing supplies of birds, animals, and fishes but should produce an increase in these resources so that future generations of Americans may profit by this wholesome recreation even beyond our own present opportunities.

The larger part of a successful conservation program in the preservation and replacement of wild life belongs to the various States, but without active participation and the leadership of the Federal Government the work will fail.

National participation has been effective but has not been either fully defined, coordinated, or supported.

Our study has not advanced to a point which justifies our positive expression of opinion at this time in the matters of consolidation under a new Federal department of conservation or a consolidation of departments under one department with a permanent under secretary in charge.

Your committee has not had the opportunity to advance its investigation of these suggestions and is leaving the subject open for further consideration.

In asking for an orderly and effective program, your committee has given first consideration to Federal activities in wild-life preservation and finds that in the case of forage and farm crops experience has developed two principles now applicable to wild life:

(a) The Federal Government's part in connection with game crops grown on State land is to assist the States to work out better game-cropping methods. The Federal function is research and demonstration.

(b) On Federal lands the Federal Government should conduct its own game-cropping operations.

In seeking means to apply approved principles in Federal projects to develop wild life your committee has endeavored to define, in part, the responsibility of the National Government and to allocate this responsibility to the various departments and bureaus. The committee recommends concentration on the allotted subjects by these departments in order to promote a more effective coordination among the Federal agencies.

Congress has created two major Federal bureaus especially to administer the resources of birds, mammals, and fishes and designed to be the scientific fact-finding organization for all Federal agencies and operations having to do with the development, protection, and utilization of wild life. They are the Bureau of Fisheries in the Department of Commerce and the Bureau of Biological Survey in the Department of Agriculture. The functions of these two bureaus in the Federal program are of a vital and peculiar nature. From these bureaus must come the information, both scientific and practical, to enable administration executive agencies to use methods for increasing the production of wild life which are economical and practical.

The Park Service, in the Department of Interior, and the Forest Service, in the Department of Agriculture, are two major Federal bureaus also principally responsible for the preservation and replacement of wild life by reason of the control which they exercise over great areas of public domain; the opportunities thus provided for increasing the supply on such lands and also because of the demonstration value of such operations to the State commissions and to other organizations and individuals engaged in similar undertakings.

We find that conservation is directly or partly administered by all members of the President's Cabinet: The Secretary of State; Secretary of Agriculture; Secretary of Commerce; Secretary of the Interior; Secretary of the Treasury; Secretary of War; Secretary of the Navy; the Attorney General, directing the Department of Justice; the Postmaster General; and the Secretary of Labor.

The necessity for coordination and cooperation between State enforcement and national enforcement is self-evident.

Industrial developments and the rapid expansion of the American population in its manifold activities and occupations have made serious inroads upon the forests and other natural environments of wild life. The marsh and other areas so necessary to the maintenance of wild fowl suffered especially by this development. Tremendous acreages were drained, and in many cases the soil exposed by the drainage operations proved to be worthless for agriculture.

Improved roads and the widespread use of automobiles and motor boats have brought the sportsman more quickly to his game. Even the effect of the building of railroads in the Middle West and the introduction of cold storage have hastened an unfortunate situation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I desire particularly the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], who have expended much time and effort in the preparation of this bill. I think those who have not made a study of the subject are not fully informed of the conditions which the bill intended to remedy, in part.

With the multiplication of the processes of civilization, the clearing up of large swamp and forest areas, the placing of them in cultivation, the reclamation, by drainage and other processes, of grounds which constitute the natural breeding and hatching places of animals and fowls, the constant consequent narrowing down of the places where such animals and fowls may find life and protection, wild life in America is disappearing much more rapidly than is generally understood. The time is not far distant when any remedy which can be offered will prove largely futile, for the reason that it will come too late. Indeed, I am not certain, from the limited study I have been able to make of the subject, that we have not already waited too long, and that in spite of everything which may now be done it will prove difficult, and almost impossible, to preserve wild life within the meaning of the intention of this proposed act and its author.

Some years ago, at the instance of those who were familiar with the problem, I introduced in the Senate a bill to establish game sanctuaries in the national forests; I refer to Senate bill 266, introduced April 18, 1929. I do not refer to that with any degree of pride, because it has not been practicable to secure action on the measure. The bill has been reintroduced during the present session. It provides:

That for the purpose of providing breeding places for game animals on lands in the national forests not chiefly suitable for agriculture, the President of the United States is hereby authorized, upon recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture and with the approval of the State legislatures of the respective States in which said national forests are situated, to establish by public proclamation certain specified areas within said forests as game sanctuaries or refuges, which shall be devoted to the increase of game animals of all kinds naturally adapted thereto, but it is not intended that the lands included in such game sanctuaries or refuges shall cease to be parts of the national forests wherein they are located, and the establishment of such game sanctuaries or refuges shall not prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from permitting other uses of the national forests under and in conformity with the laws and the rules and regulations applicable thereto.

There are other provisions in the bill which seek to effectuate its purposes.

As Senators all know, particularly those Senators who represent Western States, there are millions of acres of lands within these national forests; and these areas, or at least large parts of them, may be operated and preserved in entire consistency with their simultaneous use as game sanctuaries. It would conform to the purposes of the section now under consideration if the Senator in charge of the bill should see fit to give consideration to the incorporation of some such provision as that embraced in the bill to which I have been referring.

The bill creating game sanctuaries in national forests was prepared at my suggestion by the departments which are intrusted with the administration of the national forests, and it is so framed that, in the opinion of those authorities, its administration would not interfere with the use of the forests for the purposes for which they were created.

It would constitute a material advance along the line which the committee reporting the pending bill evidently had in mind, in that it would make possible at once the creation of refuges for wild animals, game animals, and birds; and carry forward the purposes of conservation without undue interference with any other use of the land, and it would not bring into the public domain areas which are not now a part of the national forests. It would result in a sensible and practicable use being made of these natural sanctuaries, and if something of this nature had been begun 20 or even 10 years ago we would not be confronted now with the conditions which we are all desirous of remedying.

The protection of the breeding places of game animals is not an immaterial matter by any means; it is a very material one, because they supply a large part of the food products consumed by the people of the United States. These breeding places are constantly being diminished in number and in area, and one reason why the question of the preservation of wild life has become so acute at this time is the fact that during 1930 an additional natural cause cut off perhaps one-half of the supply of game which might have been anticipated without that cause. Great droughts, extending to the hatching places and the breeding places of fowl and animals which require water for their propagation, prevented the normal processes of propagation.

I wonder whether the attention of the committee was called to this bill, and whether they would like to consider it as an amendment to the section now under consideration. It would result in a definite incorporation, in the areas useful for the propagation of wild life and the protection of wild life, of literally millions of acres of land suitable for the purposes.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has stated precisely what the committee had in mind in preparing this bill, and he stated it very clearly.

The chief purposes of the bill were to help those States within whose borders are still found the largest remnants of game and wild life, mammals and fish, and it is perfectly apparent that the Senators from those States are not in sympathy with all the provisions of the bill. I refer particularly to the States of Wyoming, Montana, and Idaho. Those are the States which most need help; they are the States which we are determined to help, and we thought this bill would help them. But apparently there are some objections to the bill.

I do not wish to have the bill lose its place on the calendar. I do want to have it helpful, and so does the entire committee. Therefore, if there is no objection, I would like to have the bill go over until to-morrow, and we will try to iron out these difficulties and see if we can not get a really constructive measure here by to-morrow.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I would like to point out to the Senator that the provision I have been describing contemplates the consent of the legislatures of the States in which the areas exist.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, it is quite agreeable to me that the bill should go over, but before that course is taken I want to remark that no doubt the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] is concerned about military reservations and that sort of thing. It will be remembered, however, that the disposition of abandoned military reservations is provided for by general law. It would meet the requirements in that respect well enough to have a simple provision in the pending bill that nothing in it shall be construed to repeal or amend the law in relation to the disposition of abandoned military reservations, so that the law could not be made applicable to them.

But there is another feature of the bill which I think has not been adverted to particularly and concerning which I should like to speak for the information of the committee in its work in redrafting the bill, if it should take that course.

Section 7 of the bill reads as follows:

SEC. 7. The Bureau of Biological Survey and the Bureau of Fisheries are hereby authorized to make surveys of the wild-life resources of the public domain, or of any lands owned or leased by the Government, to conduct such investigations as may be necessary for the development of a program for the maintenance of an adequate supply of wild life in these areas, to establish game farms and fish-cultural stations commensurate with the need for replenishing the supply of game and fur-bearing animals and fish thereon, and, in cooperation with the National Park Service, the Forest Service, or other Federal agencies, the State agencies, to coordinate and establish adequate measures for wild-life control on such areas.

I do not know whether it is the correct construction, but it would appear to me as though this provision would authorize the Bureau of Biological Survey and the Bureau of Fisheries to establish game preserves, which, of course, implies the purchase of the necessary land, the establishment of the necessary buildings, and that kind of thing. As to the establishing of fish-cultural stations, I think the principle has the approval of every Member of this body, but heretofore Congress has reserved to itself the power to say where and when fish-cultural stations shall be established. I doubt whether Congress would like to grant full authority to the Bureau of Fisheries and the Bureau of Biological Survey to establish stations at will, or the power to do such a thing. I scarcely think it could have been the intention of the committee to confer any such power upon the bureau.

I make these suggestions in view of the possibility that the bill may be amended by the committee.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, before the bill goes over may I pursue the suggestion just made by the Senator from Montana to the extent of calling attention to the fact that under section 9 the authority even to accept the donations of land for these various purposes is transferred to the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Commerce? The power even to accept donations is conferred. It seems to me those donations might amount to a sufficient magnitude upon occasion to be comparable almost with the offering of a national park, which, of course, we could not accept without the authorization of Congress, because it has implied in it the responsibility of upkeep and public taxation for that purpose. It seems to me if the question is to be restudied most assuredly section 9 should be restudied from that viewpoint.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, I am very much in favor of the bill going over. No State in the Union is more interested in the conservation of wild life than is Idaho. We have within the borders of that State the greatest fishing and hunting grounds in the country, and for that reason we are deeply interested in any legislation that is proposed affecting the matter. The pending bill has been brought before the Senate before our people had a full chance to study it. They know nothing about its provisions. I think it is very well to have the bill go over to afford us an opportunity to give it consideration before we discuss it on the floor of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will go over.

WORLD COURT MATERIAL

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask to have printed as a Senate document a chronological history of the proceedings with reference to the World Court. The matter has been arranged by the executive clerk, and I am informed is full and complete.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BORAH subsequently said: Mr. President, I desire to submit a written order authorizing the printing of the World Court record which I presented a few moments ago, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the order was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to prepare in the form of an executive document material relating to the subject of the World Court, consisting of indexes on the subject, contained in volume 64, Part I, of the Executive Journal; indexes to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS for the Sixty-seventh Congress, fourth session, to and including the third session of the Seventy-first Congress; reservations, resolutions, and amendments offered or submitted during the first session of the Sixty-ninth Congress, with the yea-and-nay votes thereon; the protocol with resolution of adherence and reservations agreed to on January 27, 1926; the present pending protocols and the so-called Root hearing held before the Committee on Foreign Relations on January 21, 1931; and that 2,000 copies be printed as an executive document.

IMPORTATION OF WOOD PULP

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, on yesterday I offered a resolution which is on the clerk's desk. I ask that the clerk report the resolution and I request its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the resolution be read for the information of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 95) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Tariff Commission is directed to make a thorough investigation of the effect of the depreciation in value of foreign currencies upon the importation into the United States of mechanically ground wood pulp, chemical wood pulp, unbleached or bleached, and pulpwoods, and to report to the Senate as soon as practicable the results of such investigation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Oregon whether it might not be wise to broaden the terms of the resolution? The problem presented by Canadian exchange in regard to importations of wood pulp is after all only a duplicate of the problem presented by imports from Great Britain, from Japan, and from a number of other countries that have allowed their currency to go off the gold basis. Would not the Senator be willing to broaden the resolution to extend it to all importations? The problem is the same everywhere.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I realize that the problem of exchange is involved generally, but a resolution so general in character as suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania would involve a great study and a tremendous length of time on the part of the commission. This matter was brought to my attention. It is imperative that some study be made. Hence, I took up the matter with the Tariff Commission and they suggested the resolution in its present form. There may be a lot of industries which are not caring about the investigation. This industry feels that it is important to have the investigation.

Mr. REED. I do not want to impede the passage of the Senator's resolution, so I shall prepare one of my own, if I decide to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT, as in executive session, laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting several judicial nominations, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the election of a President pro tempore.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Jones	Schall
Austin	Cutting	Kean	Sheppard
Bailey	Dale	Kendrick	Shipstead
Bankhead	Davis	Keyes	Shortridge
Barbour	Dickinson	King	Smith
Barkley	Dill	La Follette	Smoot
Bingham	Fletcher	Lewis	Steiwer
Black	Frazier	Logan	Swanson
Blaine	George	McGill	Thomas, Idaho
Borah	Glass	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	Glenn	McNary	Townsend
Brookhart	Goldsborough	Metcalf	Trammell
Broussard	Gore	Morrison	Tydings
Bulkley	Hale	Moses	Vandenberg
Bulow	Harris	Neely	Wagner
Byrnes	Harrison	Norbeck	Walcott
Capper	Hastings	Norris	Walsh, Mass.
Caraway	Hatfield	Nye	Walsh, Mont.
Carey	Hawes	Oddie	Waterman
Connally	Hayden	Pittman	Watson
Coolidge	Hebert	Reed	White
Copeland	Hull	Robinson, Ark.
Costigan	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Ninety Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is the election of a President pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). Again announcing my unimpaired pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. HOWELL's name was called). I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. HOWELL]. He is paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. If present, my colleague would vote for Senator HEBERT.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], who is detained at home on account of illness. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and vote for Senator MOSES. I was requested to announce that if the senior Senator from Ohio were present he would vote for Senator MOSES.

Mr. WAGNER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON], and therefore withhold my vote. If he were present, he would vote for Senator MOSES, and if I were permitted to vote I should vote for Senator PITTMAN.

The roll call having been concluded, resulted as follows:

FOR SENATOR PITTMAN—42

Ashurst	Connally	Hawes	Robinson, Ark.
Bailey	Coolidge	Hayden	Sheppard
Bankhead	Copeland	Hull	Smith
Barkley	Costigan	Kendrick	Swanson
Black	Dill	King	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	Fletcher	Lewis	Trammell
Broussard	George	Logan	Tydings
Bulkley	Glass	McGill	Walsh, Mass.
Bulow	Gore	McKellar	Walsh, Mont.
Byrnes	Harris	Morrison
Caraway	Harrison	Neely

FOR SENATOR MOSES—32

Austin	Goldsborough	McNary	Smoot
Barbour	Hale	Metcalf	Steiwer
Bingham	Hastings	Norbeck	Townsend
Carey	Hatfield	Oddie	Vandenberg
Dale	Hebert	Reed	Walcott
Davis	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.	Waterman
Dickinson	Kean	Schall	Watson
Glenn	Keyes	Shortridge	White

FOR SENATOR HEBERT—12

Blaine	Capper	Jones	Nye
Borah	Couzens	La Follette	Shipstead
Brookhart	Cutting	Norris	Thomas, Idaho

FOR SENATOR McNARY—1

Frazier

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this ballot Senator PITTMAN has received 42 votes, Senator MOSES 32 votes, Senator HEBERT 12 votes, and Senator MCNARY 1 vote. The total number of votes cast is 87; necessary for a choice, 44. No Senator having received a majority of the votes cast, there is no election, and the Secretary will again call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. HOWELL's name was called). Repeating the announcement I made on the previous ballot regarding my colleague and his pair, I desire to say that if present my colleague would vote for Senator HEBERT.

Mr. TYDINGS (when Mr. METCALF's name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], who is necessarily absent. If he were present, he would vote for Senator MOSES, and if I were permitted to vote I should vote for Senator PITTMAN.

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I withhold my vote.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote for Senator MOSES.

Mr. SHEPPARD (when Mr. WAGNER's name was called). The Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON]. If the Senator from New York were present, he would vote for Senator PITTMAN.

The roll call having been concluded, resulted:

FOR SENATOR PITTMAN—41

Ashurst	Connally	Hawes	Robinson, Ark.
Bailey	Coolidge	Hayden	Sheppard
Bankhead	Copeland	Hull	Smith
Barkley	Costigan	Kendrick	Swanson
Black	Dill	King	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	Fletcher	Lewis	Trammell
Broussard	George	Logan	Walsh, Mass.
Bulkley	Glass	McGill	Walsh, Mont.
Bulow	Gore	McKellar
Byrnes	Harris	Morrison
Caraway	Harrison	Neely

FOR SENATOR MOSES—31

Austin	Goldsborough	McNary	Steiwer
Barbour	Hale	Norbeck	Townsend
Bingham	Hastings	Oddie	Vandenberg
Carey	Hatfield	Reed	Walcott
Dale	Hebert	Robinson, Ind.	Waterman
Davis	Johnson	Schall	Watson
Dickinson	Kean	Shortridge	White
Glenn	Keyes	Smoot

FOR SENATOR HEBERT—13

Blaine	Couzens	La Follette	Shipstead
Borah	Cutting	Norris	Thomas, Idaho
Brookhart	Frazier	Nye
Capper	Jones

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this ballot Senator PITTMAN has received 41 votes, Senator MOSES 31 votes, Senator HEBERT 13 votes. The total number of votes cast is 85; necessary for a choice, 43. No Senator having received a majority of the votes cast, there is no election.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MCNARY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, December 17, 1931, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate December 16, 1931

UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

Gunnar H. Nordbye, of Minnesota, to be United States district judge, district of Minnesota, additional position. (Mr. Nordbye is now serving under a recess appointment.)

UNITED STATES ATTORNEYS

John B. Isbell, of Alabama, to be United States attorney, northern district of Alabama, to succeed Charles B. Kennamer, resigned, and Jim C. Smith, appointed by the court. (Mr. Isbell is now serving under a recess appointment.)

Edward W. Wells, of Pennsylvania, to be United States attorney, eastern district of Pennsylvania, to succeed Howard Benton Lewis, appointed by the court. (Mr. Wells is now serving under a recess appointment.)

John D. Hartman, of Texas, to be United States attorney, western district of Texas. (He is now serving in this position under an appointment which expired December 15, 1929.)

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1931

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, our Heavenly Father, for the imperishable realities of the soul, namely, faith, hope, and love. These are the sublime graces which inspire wise and heroic deeds and bind us together in those lasting friendships which shall abide forever. We pray that we are here to-day by a common impulse to record achievements that shall stimulate faith and confidence in our great system of government. Shed abroad in all hearts that spirit which gives courage and zest of life. These are not evoked by things and daily circumstances. With unflagging interest and generous enthusiasm may we serve the country which has so signally honored us. With unerring vision may we see "Immanuel"—God with us everywhere. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 72. Joint resolution to permit the temporary entry into the United States under certain conditions of alien participants and officials of the Third Olympic Winter Games and of the games of the Tenth Olympiad to be held in the United States in 1932.

THE SAVANNAH RIVER PROJECT

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech delivered by myself before the Rivers and Harbors Congress last week in regard to the waterways of the country, particularly the Savannah River.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I submit an address delivered by me at the Twenty-seventh Convention of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress which was held in Washington, D. C., on December 8 and 9, 1931. The facts and figures embraced in this address were furnished me by persons interested in the Savannah River project.

The address is as follows:

Savannah River is the boundary line between Georgia and South Carolina. When General Oglethorpe settled Georgia, as the last of the original thirteen Colonies, he established the city of Savannah at the mouth of the Savannah River and a trading post at the head of navigation, which later became the city of Augusta. As a trade center, with the interior and the river affording communication with the coast, Augusta grew rapidly.

Over 100 years ago tobacco was brought over the mountains from Tennessee to Augusta for shipment by water. Later, trade at Augusta had grown to such proportions that the people of Charleston built the Charleston & Augusta Railroad, now the Southern, from Charleston to Hamburg, which is just across the river from Augusta, in order to direct part of the river traffic to the port of Charleston. From that time until the present, water transportation on the river has been continuous in spite of the fact that very little improvement has been made in the original channel conditions as compared with the tremendous improvement in railway and highway facilities.

Augusta is strategically situated as an Atlantic-seaboard outlet for the wonderful Piedmont section of northwestern South Carolina, northern Georgia, the western section of North Carolina, and the eastern section of Tennessee. This area is rich in hydroelectric power and minerals and is a highly developed textile and clay-products area. Its agricultural and other potentialities are unsurpassed by any other section.

With the wonderful port of Savannah at one end and the trade and industrial center of Augusta and vicinity 200 miles inland by water on the other end, the possibilities for navigation, provided there is an adequate channel, are tremendous.

An economic survey of potential water-borne traffic between Augusta and its tributary territory and the outside world, which was made during the past year, indicates there would be a movement of about 2,000,000 tons per year and that if this tonnage moved by water there would be an annual saving to the general public of several million dollars. Even discounting these figures by a large percentage, the reduced estimate of the savings would warrant an expenditure of between thirty and fifty million dollars in the construction of improved navigation facilities.

The river and harbor act of July, 1930, authorized the construction of a 6-foot channel between Savannah and Augusta by canalization, but the people in this section desire to be on the same footing as regards navigation with those on the Warrior, the Tennessee, the Ohio, and the intracoastal cities along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, so that there can be free interchange of commerce without transfer of cargo by means of through-barge traffic. To accomplish this a channel 9 feet deep is necessary between Savannah and Augusta. Anything less on the river must be considered as a narrow-gage transportation line connecting with the standard-gage line at Savannah, and in this day and time no one would consider spending a dollar for the construction of a narrow-gage line to haul a large volume of traffic.

During the past year the Interstate Commerce Commission held extensive hearings in Augusta on an application by the Augusta-Savannah boat line for through rail-water routes and rates between the river-boat line and the railroads entering Augusta. The commission examiner, after hearing the evidence on both sides, decided that the establishment of such routes and rates was adequately justified and so recommended to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I wish to have it clearly understood that Augusta and the promoters of the Savannah River project are not fighting the railroads because they are in favor of an improved waterway. The economic survey that I have just referred to indicates that the bulk of the prospective traffic will be new traffic that is not now handled by the rail lines, and that when this traffic is developed the present business of the railroads will be enormously increased by reason of the fact that much of it must be handled by the rail lines between Augusta and the back country. The citizens of Augusta do not claim to be the potential distribution point for the entire interior of the United States, but they do claim to be in a position to give to Augusta and its legitimate trade territory the opportunity to compete with the rest of the world.

A review of the present authorized 6-foot navigation project on the Savannah River is in preparation for consideration by the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, and it is hoped that when all the facts are before him he will agree with us that a 9-foot navigation project between Savannah and Augusta is justified and that its consummation in the near future will be a large factor in hastening the return and establishment of our national prosperity.

Augusta is at the head of navigation on the Savannah River, with a vast territory rich in agricultural, mineral, and manufacturing resources in the interior of the southeast that will be influenced in its economic development by a 9-foot channel on the Savannah River. Within this area is the great Piedmont section of Georgia and the two Carolinas, with the important cities of Atlanta, Athens, Macon, and Rome, Ga.; Chattanooga and Knoxville, Tenn.; Asheville, Charlotte, and Gastonia, N. C.; and Columbia, Spartanburg, Greenville, Anderson, and Greenwood, S. C. This is the textile center of the South and textile goods will be moved from this great area to eastern markets, to the Orient via the Panama Canal, and by direct steamer from Savannah to European markets, by means of the Savannah River.

Augusta is the second largest inland cotton market in the United States, handling an average of from 1,000 to 1,500 bales of cotton per day, including Sunday.

Augusta is one of the greatest cottonseed-crushing centers in the United States, with six large mills. Huge quantities of cottonseed oil will move down the Savannah River to the refineries of the East, as will cottonseed meal and cottonseed hulls.

Augusta is in what is probably the largest kaolin-clay-producing center of the United States, with mines on each side of the Savannah River working in deposits which geologists find to be practically inexhaustible. One kaolin producer estimates that with a 9-foot channel he will move 75,000 tons annually down the Savannah River.

Augusta is the largest brick and tile producing city in the entire Southeast, with 175,000,000 building brick made there each year. The clay from which this brick is made is on the banks of the Savannah River.

The executives of several of the large oil companies have made tentative plans for putting on oil and gasoline barges as soon as the 9-foot channel is completed, and this city, which is the farthest west of any city of the Atlantic-coast region on a navigable waterway, will be the distributing point for a vast territory for petroleum products.

Large sugar-refining companies have indicated their desire to put on their own boats to Augusta on the 9-foot channel, bringing sugar from the port of Savannah for 10 cents per hundred pounds, against 18 cents per hundred pounds that is now charged by the river packet boat and 24 cents by rail.

Fertilizer materials from the phosphate beds of Florida, nitrate from Chile, and other ingredients for fertilizer will move up the Savannah River to this city, which is one of the largest fertilizer manufacturing points in the entire Southeast.

Augusta as an inland port of the Southeast, representing to this section what Houston does to the Southwest, will distribute agricultural machinery, plumbing supplies, hardware and all kinds of canned goods from both the Pacific and Atlantic coasts.

The gross estimated cost of a 9-foot channel is between $10,000,000 and $12,000,000, and the territory affected has in excess of 10,000,000 people, a section which is so rich in resources that its development in the next 25 years will be so great as to stagger the imagination.

Augusta urges a 9-foot channel because of the fact that it is going to be the standard set for inland waterways by the United States Government and will conform to the plans of the Government for the upper Mississippi River, and which have already been carried out on the Ohio. In other words, as we see it, there is no place in our economic scheme of things for a 6-foot channel with the 9-foot standard depth of all important inland waters.

Augusta, at the head of navigation on the Savannah River, with a 9-foot channel, will become the gateway and port of entry of the Southeast. Shipping via Augusta and the Savannah River will save the South millions of dollars in her actual annual freight bill—savings that will pay for the cost of the project several times each year.

THE PLACE OF FEDERAL RECLAMATION IN A FEDERAL LAND POLICY

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein an address delivered by Dr. Elwood Mead, of the Reclamation Service, on the Place of Federal Reclamation in a Federal Land Policy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I submit an address delivered by Hon. Elwood Mead, Commissioner of Reclamation, before the convention of representatives of land-grant colleges and universities at Chicago, November 19, 1931.

The address is as follows:

The reclamation which I shall discuss is the reclamation of arid land by irrigation. Originally this was not a concern of our Government. Individuals or groups of individuals turned the water of streams on low-lying bottom lands. The first works were small and inexpensive. Later corporations and districts undertook larger and costlier works, but in time all the opportunities attractive to private enterprise were utilized. The further conservation of our resources of land and water became primarily a task of the Federal Government. It alone had the resources adequate to overcome the obstacles which have to be met. The works now being built are reservoirs to hold back floods until they are needed and great and costly diversion dams and canals to utilize the water of large rivers. These works require a high degree of engineering skill and experience to design and construct them. The outlay is too great and the return is too slow to make it an attractive field for private enterprise.

The experience of the United States has been the experience of the world. Wherever irrigation works are being built, the central government builds them. This country is doing precisely what is being done in Italy, Egypt, India, Australia, Japan, Mexico, and Peru.

Irrigation and the conservation of water comprise part of the development of the western part of this country in a zone 1,500 miles wide and extending from our northern to our southern boundary, which must travel along with the growth of population and industry throughout the Nation as a whole. The economic development of the West is essential to national success and to the best use of all our resources.

Here we are evolving land and water policies suited to economic conditions. Many of these are foreign to our past traditions and experiences. The greater part of the land can be used advantageously only for forestry or grazing. Water for irrigation can not be obtained. The part which can be reclaimed is in relatively small and widely separated tracts. Its total area is insignificant—less than 1 per cent of the area cropped in the whole country.

Nevertheless, it has an important national significance. These oases of production are "seeds of civilization" in what would otherwise be unpeopled and useless deserts. They give value to the surrounding grazing land. Their influence is felt in many directions. They give winter feed to range stock. They provide cheap and fresh fruits and vegetables to local towns, mines, and lumber camps and are an important factor in the Nation's commerce. If it were not for the people of the arid States supported by irrigation and the traffic originating on and sent to these irrigated districts continental freight rates would be much higher. In one year 17 of these projects received 95,000 carloads of merchandise from eastern points valued at $120,000,000. They are life-savers to the railroads and to makers of automobiles, clothes, farm machinery, and furniture.

THE CHANGED VIEWPOINT OF THE WEST

The activities, the hopes and plans of the arid States to-day are as unlike those of 50 years ago as the automobile of to-day is unlike the covered wagon of that period. A few illustrations will show this. Cheyenne in 1880 was the chief center of the range-stock industry. The life of the range stockman was alluring. The grass eaten by the flocks and herds costs nothing. If anyone realized that the grass could be destroyed by overstocking and that the industry could survive only by combining it with irrigation, he kept it to himself. The universal desire was to keep conditions unchanged. Julian Ralph, seeking facts for his book Our Great West, came to Cheyenne and was told by one of the leading stockmen that irrigation farming in Wyoming was impossible, that only deluded visionaries advocated it, that Wyoming was suited only to the range-cattle business, and that those who talked irrigation would spoil a horn without making a spoon. To-day Wyoming has one of the best-administered irrigation laws of any arid State. Irrigation has saved the livestock industry, and no one works harder for more canals and more reservoirs than the cattle and sheep owner of Wyoming.

MINES GIVE WAY TO FARMS

In the place of mines, like the Comstock in Nevada, the Little Pittsburg in Colorado, or the Ontario in Utah, we have great irrigation projects, like Imperial Valley in California and Yakima in Washington. We have power projects, like the Southern California Edison in California and the Idaho Power Co. in Idaho. One pumps water to irrigate thousands of acres, the other provides electricity to light 10,000 farm homes. We are creating a new industrial empire based on the conservation and use of water.

Statistics are tiresome, but they show as nothing else can how the collapse of the West threatened by the decline in mining and lumbering was averted by the growth of irrigated farming. In 1900 the gold and silver output of Colorado was about $50,000,000; in 1930 it had shrunk to $6,000,000. The great Argo and Grant smelters at Denver have been torn down. There are none to take their place. The processions of ore trains that once came out of the canyons of Boulder and Clear Creeks and the Platte and Arkansas Rivers are gone. The leading railroad from Denver to Leadville has been abandoned. If there had been no other resource to take the place of the abandoned mines, if some other profitable employment of labor could not have been found, Denver to-day would be a decadent city with grass growing in its streets, as it does in the streets of Leadville and Cripple Creek. The resource was the water of its streams replenished from the snows of its mountain summits and making fertile the wonderful soil of the valleys. To-day irrigated farms give employment to more people and yield more certain and larger returns than the mines ever did.

The experience of Colorado was repeated in every State where the mining of gold and silver was once important. The gold and silver output of Montana in 1900 was over $13,000,000. By 1930 it had shrunk to less than $4,000,000. The returns from the gold and silver mines of Washington in 1930 were less than one-tenth of what they were in 1900. The Comstock lode in Nevada turned out in 20 years bullion worth $278,000,000. To-day the costly homes and business houses of the city it created are in ruins, the great mine worked out, and nothing like it exists in any State.

The pioneer who preceded the irrigator was active, but his was a destructive activity. He slashed away the mountain forests. He overgrazed and destroyed the native pasture of the valleys. He wrested a golden hoard from its hiding place. Gold is not renewed when the mine is worked out; the miner must look for a job elsewhere; the store and the boarding house have to migrate with the worker and his wages. The situation has been saved where irrigation is possible. The lumberman, the stockman, and the miner have shifted from denuding the country of its wealth to conserving its resources and creating wealth. Boise, Idaho; Phoenix, Ariz.; Yakima, Wash.; and Denver, Colo., are only a few examples of the prosperous transition to irrigated farming.

The western third of this country is becoming water conscious. It sees more clearly than in the past that future growth depends on measures adopted to conserve and distribute its water supply. In its 30 years' experience the Reclamation Bureau has learned much of what to do and what to avoid. Let me explain some of the principles which govern its action.

FEASIBILITY—ITS MEANING IN RECLAMATION

First of all, let me explain the meaning of feasibility, as found in recent reclamation laws. The act of December 5, 1924, provides that "no new project or new division of a project shall be approved for construction or estimates submitted therefor by the Secretary, until information in detail shall be secured by him concerning the water supply, the engineering features, the cost of construction, the land prices, and the probable cost of development, and he shall have made a finding in writing that it is feasible, that it is adaptable for actual settlement and farm homes, and that it will probably return the cost thereof to the United States." Federal reclamation is one of few Federal activities that is expected to pay its way, to return all the money spent in constructing works. Before the Secretary of the Interior recommends any new project for construction he has to certify that it is feasible and will probably repay all the costs incurred. Before projects are submitted to the Secretary, the soil, climate, crops, and markets have been thoroughly studied to determine what returns may be expected from irrigation. The plans and estimates of costs have been carefully reviewed and recent estimates have been remarkably close to final costs. In the case of nearly all recent projects, authority to construct has been preceded by a contract with the water users requiring the payment of the entire cost within 40 years. In 1930 over 97 per cent of the money due under these contracts was paid. The effort is to make reclamation a business activity in all the term implies.

POWER A GROWING FACTOR IN FEASIBILITY

When Federal reclamation began the opportunities to generate hydroelectric power as an adjunct to irrigation were disregarded, both in construction and in reclamation laws. Now the ability to generate such power is one of the important factors in determining the feasibility of new works. The value of power plants is twofold. Electricity on the farm makes life easier. The electric washer and the electrically driven separator save many a weary arm and tired back. The revenue from several of the power plants already built is greater than the income from irrigation payments. This income lightens the irrigation payments of farmers and makes possible many works which, without it, would not be feasible.

It is doubtful if the great development to control and utilize the Colorado River at Boulder Canyon would ever have been approved by Congress, had it not been for the fact that contracts for the power to be generated there insure the payment in 50 years of all the money spent by the Government on construction with 4 per cent interest. It gives a subsidy to the States of Nevada and Arizona, and will, in the end, leave $66,000,000 profit to be used in development elsewhere. The remarkable increase in the financial return from power plants, the industrial and social advantages of having hydroelectric power on projects make it one of the important factors in future reclamation activities. More adequate laws to protect the public interest in these power plants are needed. We need laws to define how these power plants shall be financed and how the net profits shall be used.

WHERE THE PRODUCTS OF IRRIGATION ARE MARKETED AND USED

There is a widespread misconception that Federal reclamation contributes to the agricultural surplus and so is an injury to the rest of the country. Those who know what is taking place know that is a mistake. As Secretary Wilbur has stated, one timely rain in the Mississippi Valley will cause a greater increase in our crop production than all the crops grown under Federal works. Besides, the greater part of the crops grown on arid lands are noncompetitive. Sugar beets, long-staple cotton, the products of the orchards and gardens of the Southwest that come into the markets at a time when they can not be grown elsewhere except at prohibitive cost add to our national wealth and satisfaction, but do not compete with the products of the farms of the East and Middle West. Each year an ever-increasing proportion of the products of the irrigated areas goes to meet the steadily growing needs of western cities, especially the cities of the Pacific fringe of the country. The butter from the dairy farms of Idaho goes to Los Angeles. A constantly increasing part of the products of the orchards of Oregon and Washington is finding markets across the Pacific.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF IRRIGATION INSTITUTIONS

In irrigated areas human foresight in planning has to supplement nature. Farms stretching for hundreds of miles along a stream are bound together by their common tie of dependence on its water. To protect them there must be water laws, measurement of streams, regulation of diversions. The early irrigators did not realize the significance of these things. They looked on the water of streams as being like air, free to all alike. They built ditches and took water as they shot game and caught fish. They opposed laws needed for their protection, because they believed they could always do as they pleased. They now know that as population increases the value of water increases and the struggle for its control increases in like measure.

SUPPLEMENTAL STORAGE ESSENTIAL

Dependence upon the spring floods of unregulated streams is as uncertain as dependence upon rain in time of drought. As irrigated districts began to grow better crops, to have orchards and dairy herds, they found that irrigation, to be successful, required a water supply that would last throughout the whole growing season, and such a water supply on nearly all streams necessitates storage of the floods. Reservoirs are costly. The pioneer irrigation districts could not build them, and the reclamation act was born out of their needs. The irrigation works that stand out as the greatest contribution to the prosperity of the arid region are reservoirs built to salvage private enterprises, to rescue communities, where irrigation companies were bankrupt and settlers were suffering from lack of water in midsummer to irrigate their fields.

One of the first of these works was the Roosevelt Dam. Without Government aid to create that storage, the orchards and farms which surround Phoenix, and which created Phoenix, would have gone back to desert. The floods which the Roosevelt Reservoir stores bring to maturity crops worth over $25,000,000 a year and enable the people living on the project to buy, largely from the East, manufactured goods of equal value.

Without the two reservoirs which the Government rebuilt and enlarged on the Pecos River to irrigate the burnt-up fields of the Carlsbad private project that prosperous district would to-day be only a memory.

Without the Elephant Butte Reservoir to hold back the floods of the Rio Grande the irrigated country above and below the city of El Paso, and which has done so much to make it a city, would be confined to the lands of a few primitive and discouraged Mexican irrigators.

The bankrupt private development along the Klamath River was made an enduring success when the Government put a dam across the outlet of Klamath Lake and built two other reservoirs to supplement it.

On the Yakima River private enterprise built canals; but, without stored water for later irrigation, they proved of little value. The Government has built the reservoirs. The city of Yakima, with its 22,000 people, its great fruit warehouses, and the growing vegetable industry of the valley, is the creation of these reservoirs.

THE GOVERNMENT SUPPLEMENTS PRIVATE EFFORT

The Federal Government has agreed to build five storage reservoirs to supply water to the lands first reclaimed in Salt Lake Basin at critical periods of the year. The first of these reservoirs was completed in time to be used this year. The value of the water the first season equaled the cost of the storage.

Two Government storages built on Snake River in Idaho have taken the hazard out of farming in that important valley. These two reservoirs hold over 2,000,000 acre-feet of water. It can be drawn upon whenever the settlers need it. Certainty and security have exerted a great influence toward creating better farms and better farming. The crops taken from the irrigated fields of this area give more business to the Union Pacific Railroad in a year than was furnished by the whole State before this irrigation development started. The crops saved by these storages in 1931 were worth more than the cost of the reservoirs.

The Government storage on the North Platte project was worth $1,000,000 to the farmers this year.

In all, the Federal Government has built 52 storage dams and has petitions to build 144 more. Every one of these is to improve the water supply of existing communities. Hoover Dam will create the largest artificial lake in the world. It will hold the entire flow of the Colorado River for two years. Without it, the river would continue to be a turbulent agent of destruction with an ever-present threat of inundating the irrigable lands in Mexico and the Imperial Valley in California. Los Angeles will draw on this lake to meet its imperative needs. It will add millions to the population of the Southwest and give an immense stimulus to industry.

INCOME AND EXPENDITURES OF THE RECLAMATION BUREAU

The bureau's means and efforts are to-day directed mainly to the rescue of harassed and impoverished communities that lack money and credit to help themselves. These reservoirs would be worth many times their cost. They would save farm homes and local banks and stores from failure. The progress made depends on the fund's income, which is about $6,500,000 a year.

This is being spent to build the Cle Elum Dam on the headwaters of the Yakima River, to build the Owyhee Reservoir to meet the water needs of four privately built irrigation systems in the valley of the Owyhee and Snake Rivers. It is building a larger pumping plant for the Kennewick district, which has orchards 20 years old, and will build the Hyrum Reservoir in the Cache Valley in Utah to supply the water needed to raise sugar beets on farms cleared, improved, and irrigated by the early Mormon settlers. It is building a reservoir for the Baker project in Oregon to provide water for one of the oldest communities in the State. The Seminole Reservoir in Wyoming will give that State a larger share of the water of the Platte River and create a sorely needed agricultural district in a Wyoming county which has contributed $30,000,000 to the reclamation fund from the oil leases in the mid-West field.

No activity of the Government has brought greater private and public benefits to the Nation than have come from the money spent on these Government reservoirs. Unless it is continued, scores of impoverished communities will give up, thousands of farms will be abandoned. This would be a national loss as well as a local disaster. It ought to be averted. An unhappy ending to the courage, sacrifice, and industry of thousands of worthy people who blazed the trails and began the development of irrigated agriculture would be a national calamity. The future of cities, railroads, mines, and factories, as well as farms of the arid region, rests on the measures taken for the conservation of the waters of western rivers. Water is the dominating factor in all its development. Federal reclamation is meeting a national economic need and is averting a crisis in the business and industrial life of the arid region.

RESIGNATION FROM A COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, December 15, 1931.

To the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIR: I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the Committee on Accounts.

Most respectfully yours,

EFFIEGENE WINGO.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INCOME TAX IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5821) to provide for the taxation of incomes in the District of Columbia, to repeal certain provisions of law relating to the taxation of intangible personal property in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes. Pending that, in accord with an agreement which was reached between the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] and myself, I ask unanimous consent that general debate upon the bill be limited to two hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee, Judge DAVIS, and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5821. Pending that, he asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to two hours, one half to be controlled by himself and the other by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5821, with Mr. MCMILLAN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY].

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I did not happen to be in the Chamber yesterday when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] delivered his speech, but shortly thereafter I was advised that he had delivered a speech in which he had made certain references to the President of the United States. Late last night I requested and received from the Government Printing Office a proof copy of the speech in question. I read and reread the speech a second time. I wanted to be sure that I understood just what it was that the gentleman from Pennsylvania was undertaking to say.

I think in all my reading of the record of debates in this House, in all my reading of American history, limited as that may be, nothing has ever been called to my attention which surpasses in its enormity the charges which the gentleman from Pennsylvania makes against the Chief Executive of this Nation.

Moved by various considerations, I should not have taken the notice of the gentleman's speech which I now do, were it not that it is spread upon the records of this House and has been broadcast to the Nation. The vast reading public, having no intimate knowledge of the personalities of this House, would unquestionably give the speech much credence because it was delivered by the ex-chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency. It is because the public is entitled to the facts and with a view to keeping the record of the House straight that I now take the floor.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN], in the early part of his remarks, accuses the President of a proposal "to sell us out to Germany." Referring to the President's proposed moratorium for one year, the gentleman states:

> If he was the agent of Germany. * * * We can not have an agent of Germany acting as President of the United States.

With that sentiment I think we are all in accord. But here I call the attention of the House to the fact that when the gentleman from Pennsylvania neared the close of his speech he abandoned the precautionary "if," and makes the open charge that "Germany was guilty" of violating the provisions of the Young plan, because she, Germany, was "using the President of the United States as an agent instead of acting for herself." Therefore we have the flat charge that the Chief Executive of this Nation has permitted himself to be used as an agent by the German Nation, and, as the gentleman would have us believe, to inflict losses upon the masses of our people who toil in order to lessen the burden of a nation but yesterday our enemy in the World War.

I have taken as much pains as has been possible in the time at my command—of this I give assurance to the House—to justify myself in the statement which I am about to make. I say that there is not an iota, not the smallest particle, of truth in this infamous accusation. [Applause.]

There are those of us who have been in close contact with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN]—I myself have been a member of his committee for several years—who have felt for some time that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has come under the spell of pernicious influences. Just what there is behind the succession of speeches which has been launched for the past year or more against our banking system and the administration in general by the gentleman I am not now prepared to state. The gentleman stated yesterday that—

> It will be interesting when this matter goes to trial before the Permanent Court of International Justice to find out whether Herbert Hoover was acting as a legal agent of Germany or as the President of the United States when he made his [moratorium] proposal.

Let me say to the House that there are those of us here who think it would be quite as interesting, if trial and hearing could be had, for the information of the country generally, to ascertain just what sinister influences are moving the gentleman from Pennsylvania and just whose is the Machiavellian hand behind the speeches which the gentleman has been delivering upon this floor.

There are at my command facts which I might utilize at this time in derogation of the individual, who is by no means sparing in his accusations of the President. However, I shall forego personal references in that direction because I believe it is always most helpful to steer as clear of personalities as possible.

The accusation that President Hoover in December, acting as a member of a group of international conspirators, made secret overtures to the German Government, seeking the opportunity to help Germany at the sacrifice of American interests is absurd and indefensible. It is not true.

I do not know what part, if any, Treviranus, the German Minister of Transportation, may or may not have in what is all too apparently a far-flung conspiracy to impeach the integrity of our President. However, the minister's address reported to have been delivered in Berlin on October 23 last, to the effect that "the American President was in intimate negotiations with the German Government regarding a year's debt holiday as early as December 1930," and that the President "did not even let his Cabinet members know what was going on" is an unqualified falsehood. This insidious attempt to poison the public mind by implanting in it the thought that President Hoover, deceiving his own Cabinet, was endeavoring behind their backs as early as December, 1930, to put over a plan which has been represented as robbery of the American Nation and in aid of Germany is a cheap and traitorous attempt to assassinate the character and befoul the integrity of our President.

I am authentically advised that this subject of a moratorium for war debts first came under consideration by the President on May 6 last, when former Senator Sackett, now ambassodor to Germany from the United States, arrived in this country. He then brought to the attention of the President and certain officials of the Government the extremely serious situation which existed in Germany, if not in Europe as a whole. At that time the possibility of a moratorium was given thoughtful consideration and in the customary manner. Natural prudence would have deterred the President from making what would then have been a premature announcement of his deliberations concerning public questions vitally affecting not only our own country but other nations as well. To have done so on May 6, or at any time subsequent thereto pending a final conclusion, would have been to violate every precedent and to have grossly betrayed the best interests of all concerned.

I am further able to assure this House that so late as the 14th of last June, when the President started for the West to dedicate the Harding memorial, he was still undecided either as to the wisdom or the necessity of a year's moratorium on war debts.

The crisis which was precipitated in Austria by the failure of the Credit Anstalt in May, 1931, and culminated on Friday, June 19, with withdrawals from the Reichsbank in Germany so heavy that its reserves reached the legal minimum. This constrained the President to the decision that it was not only his duty to his own country, but to the world, to urge a year's moratorium on war debts. He straightway made the decision—subsequent to his return from the West—contacted Members of the Congress and announced the moratorium proposal on the 20th of June.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] pictures the President as at all times engaged in a secret and malign conspiracy. It was in pursuance of this secrecy, if we are to believe the charge of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the President called in consultation numerous of the Members of the House of Representatives and the United States Senate. Was this, indeed, the act of a President who sought to betray his country in secret? Surely, a general consultation by the President with the Members of the Congress does not support the claim that the President was promoting his traitorous purpose in darkness and in secrecy.

Just how could the President have invited more general consideration of his moratorium proposal prior to its public announcement? There was but one alternative. As my esteemed friend from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, has said, the President could have called the Congress in special session. Would any different considerations obtain under such procedure than obtain at the present moment? Certainly not. The President was loath to subject the country to the unnecessary expense of a special session. He had received evidence through the customary diplomatic channels. He had gathered facts from numerous and authentic sources of information in this country and, proceeding in strict accordance with his oath of office, he presented his recommendations through a message to the Congress in regular session.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] would have the country infer that the President was stabbing France in the back. If that were so, surely the French nation is intelligent enough to have known it. The President must indeed have been an archconspirator if, having betrayed France, he could then turn to that country and invite her Prime Minister, Monsieur Laval, to a series of conferences. If France had been betrayed, do you think her Prime Minister would have accepted the President's invitation, journeyed to this country, and participated in that series of cordial and friendly exchanges of ideas which may ultimately prove to be of greater help to the stricken world than you or I can now estimate?

I think the charge that the President betrayed France is sufficiently answered by the attitude of that country herself, not only in sending her Prime Minister for a conference with our President, but later in agreeing to a moratorium proposal.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] painted in glaring colors the details of a conspiracy. He builded a veritable tissue of heinous machinations which he lays at the door of President Hoover. He pursued his way in exultation from one scene of the monstrous plot to another until at length, carried away by his own enthusiasm, reason is displaced and ludicrous impossibility is enthroned. He climaxes the entire plot by representing the crash in the stock market of 1929 as a part of the entire scheme perpetrated by those whom he repeatedly nominates German international bankers. At this point he would have us believe that the international conspirators had signaled the electrician, had called for the spotlight and pushed President Hoover upon the stage to announce his proposed moratorium in the midst of falling prices and tremendous personal losses incident to a financial panic. Here every vestige of reason and sense in the alleged climax of the conspiracy disappears. If, indeed, the President had entered into any such conspiracy he certainly would have been intelligent enough to suggest to his masters, the German bankers, that the time to ask the American people to indorse a moratorium of war debts owing us by foreign nations was not when we had become impoverished in 1931, as the result of a world-wide depression.

Had the gentleman from Pennsylvania argued that German bankers, dominating our President and tricking the American Nation, had lent aid and encouragement to a policy of inflated credits and an unjustifiable bull-market orgy; had he advanced the seductive accusation that these self-same German international bankers had then proceeded to crack the whip over President Hoover in the fall of 1929 when prices were at their peak and we were deluding ourselves with fictitious evidences of wealth, it might have been barely possible for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to convince some of our people that there was a grain of truth in his cunningly fabricated charges. Certainly, no one with intelligence enough even to enter this alleged conspiracy, much less to fashion the methods of its operation, would aim to reduce us to a state of depression and necessity, and choose that hour of our necessity as the psychological moment to ask that we temporarily forgive our debtors. The entire charge of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] is absurd, preposterous, and false.

I deny in whole and in part, in toto and seriatim, those charges contained in the gentleman's speech which attribute to the President of the United States any disloyal conduct, any betrayal of the interests of his own people. [Applause.]

My colleagues, the world is in extremity. Civilization itself stands at the crossroads. The family of nations is well nigh prostrate. People the world over are laboring under the burdens of debt incident to a world war which never should have been. We of America are one member of this family of nations. True, we are not a member of the League of Nations, but it is equally true we are inextricably interwoven with the very fabric of the world's civilization. Shall we assume an attitude of sufficiency unto ourselves? Can we ignore the hardships of our debtors whose crippled purchasing power is contributing to the paralysis of trade and the stagnation of world markets? Shall we stand aloof and unsympathetic with the problems and hardships of our world neighbors? All partisanship aside, no man of us would advocate that his country take any such stand. Furthermore, no thinking man of us would lend encouragement to future wars in Europe by permanently forgiving the war debts of Europe. But with commerce languishing, with want and need on all hands, the question has been, and is, What can the United States do not only to help itself but to assist a stricken world to rise from its knees to its feet? President Hoover's answer to this question was, let us give our debtors a breathing space. To that end he proposed a year's moratorium. To that proposal of the President, the Congress and the country should give their unqualified support.

So much for the humanitarianism upon which, among other considerations, the President places justification for his moratorium proposal. So much apropos of the charge of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN], that the President has linked his proposal "as usual with a lot of false and insincere humanitarianism."

At the very outset the gentleman from Pennsylvania misled the House. Bear in mind that it is the President's advocacy of a moratorium which is under discussion from the start. He tells you that "the Hoover proposal originated in the offices of the German international bankers in New York." He tells you that the plan was presented to Mr. Hearst months before it was made public. He tells you that it was presented by at least one of these bankers to President Hoover, "who was rebuked by Mr. Hearst for his cheek and impudence." In proof of these assertions the gentleman from Pennsylvania quotes the following statement of William Randolph Hearst—I am now reading from page 560 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 15:

> This plan for revision of war debts, with America paying the piper while war-mad Europe dances, is purely a plan of international bankers, who make money through commissions out of spoliation of their countrymen.

This was the plan which was presented to Mr. Hearst and repudiated by him. But what plan is it which is referred to in the statement by Mr. Hearst? Mark you, it is not the Hoover plan for a year's moratorium, or delay in payment. It was a plan for revision of war debts.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes, but I will say to him that I will be unable to yield him any further time.

Mr. BEEDY. I thank the gentleman.

But any plan for the revision of war debts was quite distinct and apart from the plan for a year's moratorium proposed by President Hoover. In fact, you will recall that when the President announced the proposed moratorium, he specifically stated that it had no connection whatever with any proposal for the revision or cancellation of war debts. The plan, therefore, which was rejected by Mr. Hearst was an entirely different plan, dealing with an entirely different subject matter and having nothing whatever to do with the plan announced by President Hoover.

I have lived to see many things happen in this House which I never expected would happen. But I had never dreamed that I should live to read in the record of House proceedings an utterance by a man, whom I took to be a loyal American citizen, charging the President of the United States with any such preposterous offense as that which has been made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN].

I do not know how the country may react to the gentleman's speech. I do not know what may be the mental processes of men in this House with respect to the charges which have been launched. For myself, when I contemplate such vicious and groundless accusations against the man who is to-day ridden not alone with the cares ordinarily incident to the great office of Chief Executive but burdened as well by the extraordinary cares incident to a world crisis, against a man, in this hour of his great trial, when our own Government and the well being of humanity are in the crucible, I unhesitatingly take my stand by the President in the White House. It is that President who, though worn and harried and misrepresented, still continues patiently and diligently at his task, moved only by a great love for his country and a sincere purpose, to do the best he can under extremely difficult circumstances. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Pennsylvania quoted from President Hoover's speech delivered at the dedication of the Harding memorial. I shall assume that he quoted with entire approval the noble sentiment therein expressed. I shall certainly not attribute to him any other motive. The quote is as follows, and I read from page 563 of the RECORD for December 15:

> There are disloyalties and there are crimes which shock our sensibilities, which may bring suffering upon those who are touched by their immediate results. * * * But the breaking down of the faith of a people in the honesty of their government and in the integrity of their institutions, the lowering of respect for the standards of honor which prevail in high places, are crimes for which punishment can never atone.

These are the words of our President. They are the words of a man whom it is sought to stigmatize as a traitor. I commend them to the thoughtful and silent consideration of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN]. I say to him, irrespective of his motives—for they indeed are hidden from my sight and are open alone to the Infinite—I say to him that he has done his country a great disservice. Yes; in this hour of unrest, when there is a concerted attempt to undermine our system of representative government and the financial fabric of the world, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN], by his reckless utterance, may have done his country and the world a greater disservice than he realizes. In so doing he becomes guilty of a crime for which punishment can never atone. [Applause.]

In closing, inasmuch as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has taken it upon himself to prefer charges so grave and reprehensible in their nature against the Chief Executive of the Nation, I now demand of him in the interest of fair play, in behalf of the American people, in behalf of those of us intrusted with the responsibility of government, in behalf of those whose dollars are invested in American industry and in behalf of those millions who depend for a livelihood upon their own labor, I demand that he produce authentic proof that the President has acted as an agent of the German Government. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. TEMPLE. If the gentleman will permit, I think it fitting for me to say that the Republican members of the Pennsylvania delegation held a meeting this morning and passed a resolution indorsing the 1-year moratorium and expressing complete confidence in the President of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we have observed here upon yesterday and to-day a very unusual, if indeed I might not say, a very remarkable, incident in the annals of the Congress.

Upon yesterday the former chairman of the House Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. McFADDEN] saw fit, upon his own responsibility as a Member of this House, to make certain very grave and serious charges against the Chief Executive of this Nation. I am not advised, of course, upon the basis of what facts those charges were made. That is answered this morning by a statement from the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] by innuendo, at least, that if he were disposed to do so, he could produce certain facts that might reflect upon the integrity of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] in connection with his speech.

Speaking as a Democrat and as one whose party has been charged with the deliberate purpose to undertake to "smear" in the national esteem the dignity and integrity of the President of the United States, I merely take occasion here this morning to call to the attention of the House and of the country that these charges, amounting in effect to an impeachment of the President of the United States for high crimes and misdemeanors, do not come from the Democratic side of this House. [Applause.]

I think it shall be the legitimate purpose and expectation of the Democratic Party in the coming national campaign to take advantage of every legitimate political opportunity that falls into its hands for attacking the present Republican administration, but I feel that I voice, without having consulted it, the best thought of the political sportsmanship of the Democratic side of this House that if we expect to win the national election, we shall do it upon the basis of the President's incapacity for leadership, the blunders of the Republican administration for the last 10 years, and that it shall not be predicated upon any presumed malfeasance in office or lack of patriotism upon the part of the President. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it seems almost unreasonable to take the time of the House, which is valuable time to every Member, to discuss what seems to be a local matter and one that is put before us as a committee that we would gladly have avoided except it has been assigned to us and we have undertaken to perform the duty.

In view of the importance of the questions that have been discussed here to-day and yesterday, I feel this is true, and yet we are anxious to be relieved of a task that we have performed under direction of the House and had sought to perform properly and give you the facts to which you are entitled.

Both papers this morning, and the papers last night, criticized without gloves those who have been engaged in the work of this committee in trying to give to the House the facts that have come to us through the experts and through the studies we have made, and I am not going to answer the billingsgate of one of the morning papers. Those of us who know the publisher, know his character, and know the character of others who are responsible for such statements would not object to having our own records compared with theirs, and yet they abuse men, misrepresent their motives and acts so that no one wants to act in District matters.

I am not going to discuss them personally, but I am going to emphasize, if I may, in a few moments a situation that confronts the country in regard to the city of Washington and the District of Columbia that you should know. You Members who come from outside of the city should know what is being done here, the purpose of the proffered legislation. It ought to be discussed frankly on the floor of the House, because we have no other way by which to reach the subject of District taxes, of lump-sum appropriations or the District dole, as it was called this morning.

So, I am going to read, briefly, not from the additional views which I expressed to you yesterday and placed in the RECORD. I think that is practically a complete answer to the subject of unjust taxation if the committee is correct in its facts, and we are all agreed about that. I desire to discuss briefly the effect of this unfair District taxation scheme upon the rest of the country and in relation to a publisher of whom I speak in the highest terms, because I believe he is a gentleman whom we all respect, but do resent some of his unjust comments on the committee's labor.

Mr. Chairman, the hearings of the committee occupied a number of weeks and many District witnesses appeared, practically all of whom agreed that the District should pay the same average tax as that paid by comparable cities, but with the contention in nearly every case that it was doing so at the present time. This committee, as stated, has found to the contrary, and that $14,000,000 annually would be required to equal that paid by 22 other comparable cities.

In seeking to sustain the position that it is paying full taxes, the city at the outset presented the Government's Board of Efficiency that volunteered some novel tax suggestions never before encountered by any city or other government, and that fell by their own weight. This commission at the outset insisted it had been requested by committee members to prepare a report and it was given full publicity by the local press because of its evident efforts to maintain the District's claim of present payment of full taxes. This statement was repudiated by every member of the committee and apparently was due to a mistake, or to effort in advance to prejudice any action by the committee.

The commission first proposed the original idea that Washington was paying a per capita tax equal to that of the average city, and it quoted some meaningless statistics of average per capita property holdings to sustain this position. Every tax authority in this and every other country rejects any such theory. A brief illustration is sufficient to show its absurdity.

During the past 10 years and more Secretary Mellon has lived most of the time in Washington and is practically a resident of the city, although a taxpayer of Pittsburgh. If based on estimates of his wealth, if he was rated a Washington resident, it would raise the average per capita holding of wealth nearly $2,000 for each individual, although 487,000 other residents would have no individual benefits from his holdings.

In like manner his assistant, formerly a Member of Congress and resident of New York but officially living in Washington, according to his estimated wealth would have given a per capita holding for Representatives in Congress during his membership in that body of approximately $200,000 more than the average held.

These illustrations could be carried on indefinitely, and, on the other hand, many thousands of employees working in factories outside of big cities are an added burden placed upon the taxpayers of these cities during the closing of the great mills in which they are employed.

It would be as logical to claim that the color of the hair or its partial absence among men of one community would furnish a standard for men of another community. The property held has no relation whatsoever to the per capita method of estimates. That is fully recognized by every municipality and tax authority in the world, because, so far as the committee's investigation goes, it has never been employed and was only a creature of the fertile brain of the tax adviser of the Government's Efficiency Bureau.

Another equally original absurd argument was offered by this same commission which sought to fix the value, not only upon the real property owned by the Government in the District, but upon the personal property as well, and even upon intangibles. The whole method of comparison was without any authority or quoted from any responsible tax experts the whole world over. Apart from this fact, no other city has ever adopted the plan nor has it been suggested that it should adopt any such method of offset as proposed by the commission.

I have offered a brief illustration of a few of these offset items which disclose the labored efforts of the Efficiency Bureau to ignore the plain facts of the case and place a heavy burden upon the Federal Government.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if he pays any serious consideration at all to any statement or report from the Bureau of Efficiency?

Mr. FREAR. The committee rejected it entirely because of the absurdity of the reasoning.

Mr. BLANTON. It is the most unreliable of any bureau in the Government to-day.

Mr. FREAR. Fantastic tax gymnastics were offered by the Bureau of Efficiency that furnished several witnesses from among its employees, who frequently were local taxpayers to be affected by the result.

Water works and reservoirs	$15,950,000
Soldiers' Home, St. Elizabeths, and others	25,733,709
Navy yard and Judiciary Square	60,120,938

Other items of from a few thousand dollars to $10,000,000 are named by the "bureau," all reaching a grand total of $499,960,928, or, to avoid more certain comment, $39,072 short of a half billion dollars. "Values," "sentimental" or otherwise, used by District residents in many instances but "offset" against District assessments.

The Efficiency Bureau did not offset churches, but reached all other nonprofit Government business that could be discovered in the District excepting the Monument.

This is all nonprofit Federal property taxed or offset by this efficiency commission. No other place in the world so far as known indorses or accepts such reasoning or lack of reason. To complete the picture, the Federal Government set apart this district and property originally for its own use.

Federal personal property, machinery, furniture, etc., was estimated at	$180,000,000
But depreciation was allowed arbitrarily at	90,000,000
Leaving Federal tangible personal property	90,000,000

The efficiency commission admitted it could not even vaguely reach varying cash in the Federal Treasury, but that was lumped off just casually at $90,000,000 for intangible values. Match it if you can anywhere in the universe. Chief "Expert" Murphy's testimony in hearings extract, attached hereto, gives his views adopted by the Efficiency Bureau on the subject.

Even the surplus of park area over 14 city parks average was scientifically determined and "charged off" against the Government for values and maintenance.

It was a picture painted by a United States Bureau of Efficiency that shows an inventive genius which might be employed at some more useful and certain work—or these "efficiency experts" should all be taken from the pay rolls of a Government they impose upon by such unbusinesslike taxing theories.

A third basis of tax comparison was constantly used by bureau "experts" and others in this adventure in tax wonderlands, known as a "per capita basis." Incidentally, it is nowhere employed in the world for tax purposes. It was figured that notwithstanding a fair proportion of millionaires and many people of wealth and a relatively small proportion of poor people, when compared with great industrial centers, the city of Washington should pay a per capita proportion compared with expert population computations from 14 cities it considered. This plan was rejected by the committee, and by every tax authority the world over.

Mr. Chairman, let me repeat the average adjusted rates based on reducing the present tax rates of comparable cities arrived at by careful and exhaustive study as heretofore stated. From these studies it will be readily seen that Washington with an adjusted rate of $15.30 is less than one-half that of Louisville and by far the lowest rate of any city.

The 23 comparable cities and adjusted rates are as follows:

City:	Rate
Louisville	$30.80
Boston	29.26
Minneapolis	28.54
Pittsburgh	26.60
Rochester	24.01
Atlanta	21.70
Cincinnati	17.68
Kansas City	17.58
Jersey City	30.34
Memphis	28.94
Buffalo	27.67
Milwaukee	26.34
Baltimore	23.40
San Francisco	20.20
St. Louis	17.61
Washington	15.30
Newark	29.55
Seattle	28.56
Portland	26.89
Denver	24.26
Cleveland	23.08
Dallas	18.18
Providence	17.68

The $9,500,000 annual contribution is referred to in the District press as a "District dole," to be maintained or increased irrespective of additional revenues derived from increased gas, motor-vehicle, estate, income, and other taxes. The following increases have been recommended as just and equitable by the committee based on above average tax rate:

An increased gas tax	$1,600,000
An increased motor-vehicle tax	1,000,000
Income and estate taxes	1,500,000
Increased public-utilities taxes	640,000
Increased railway-tunnel taxes, etc	175,000
Increased real and personal taxes	9,000,000
Total	13,915,000

This increased tax of about $14,000,000 annually should be paid before any District dole can be properly or justly fixed.

Contributions to the Federal Treasury and payments back to the contributors are studied by the States more than by local beneficiaries.

For 1930 the same year the following payments and receipts by and from the Federal Government are noted in several of the States:

Pennsylvania paid in $230,202,064; percentage returned, 3.1.

Michigan paid in $137,076,199; percentage returned, 2.8.

Illinois paid in $247,137,637; percentage returned, 1.7.

Among the smaller payments were:

Wisconsin paid in $35,512,796; percentage returned, 12.3.

Tennessee paid in $16,478,693; percentage returned, 15.5.

Texas paid in $38,884,521; percentage returned, 22.6.

The largest payment and the amount returned:

New York paid in $928,955,021; amount returned, $8,727,208, or less than 1 per cent.

The District of Columbia received more than any State in its subsidy, $9,500,000, and discloses another reason why Washington should properly pay the same tax rate as is now paid by 22 comparable cities.

In 1930 it is stated New York State paid about $929,000,000 in round numbers toward the support of the Federal Government and received back through various Federal subsidies $8,727,208, or less than 1 per cent of the amount contributed by this one State.

New Jersey paid $123,948,441 and received back $1,976,285, or only 1.6 per cent.

Illinois paid $247,137,637 and received back $4,300,201, or only 1.7 per cent.

Pennsylvania paid $230,203,064 and received back $7,069,423, or only 3.1 per cent.

Michigan paid $137,076,199 and received back $3,807,833, or only 2.8 per cent.

Wisconsin paid $35,512,796 and received back $4,372,665, or only 12.3 per cent.

Tennessee paid $16,478,693 and received back $2,561,202, or only 15.5 per cent.

Texas paid $38,884,521 and received back $8,786,883, or only 22.6 per cent.

The District paid in about $15,000,000 and received back about 66 per cent of that amount.

These figures include several States represented by the membership of this committee. They are not offered to present comparisons of States but to show that every one of these States pays far more for Federal and District support than it receives back.

Several Western States receive more than they pay, but in the whole list not a single State from New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, or any of the remaining 45 States receive from all Federal subsidies combined as much as the District of Columbia's $9,500,000, which the local press says is far too little and should be increased. Actual comparisons present a picture to the rest of the country that can not be ignored. If District tax rates are increased $10,000,000 instead of $14,000,000, there will be no need of Congress giving any District dole.

The committee's tax expert, at the committee's request, has made comparisons of average real-estate taxes paid in 23 comparable cities giving a corrected adjustment so far as possible by bringing down the assessed values compared with actual values and tax rates to a common basis. That statement is unprejudiced and I believe discloses the real facts of under taxation in the District compared to the rest of the country that contributes the $9,500,000.

The list of cities in population begins with Cleveland, Ohio, and ends with Providence, R. I. The cities reported within these limits include Washington, with a $1.53 per hundred rate or $15.30 per thousand dollars tax on its real estate, at 100 per cent valuation. The adjusted-tax rate of Washington among all these 23 cities was by far the lowest on the list, and a brief comparison by any Member will disclose that probably in no case is the tax paid by him in his home district on $1,000 in actual values of real estate in his own community anywhere near so low as $15.30, the adjusted rate paid in Washington. All States can not be compared, but about a score are submitted that speak their own lesson.

COMPARE TAX RATES PAID BY WELL-KNOWN PAPERS

The two outstanding papers of Washington, one published by Editor McLean and the other by Editor Noyes, president of the Associated Press, continually scold Congress and any questioning Member when District taxes are under consideration. The Washington Post is valued at $3,000,000, recently offered. The tax increase for the Post can readily be figured in all cases.

It is probable that Mr. Noyes, an eminently fine gentleman personally, owner, or largely owner, of the Washington Star and other properties, is worth a million dollars, maybe much more. No one begrudges him his wealth, whatever it may be. As real and personal property District tax rates are the same, it may not be important for comparison whether his holdings are real or personal property; but how do his tax payments compare with those of other papers of like or comparable circulation in 22 other municipalities?

The Star is a gold mine. His newspaper and other properties are now subject to a tax rate of only $15,300 on a million dollars of real estate, based on a rate found of $15.30 per thousand.

Now, I want to discuss a gentleman, one of the editors of a paper in this city, because he is a gentleman of high intellectual ability. He stands high in the country at large; he is president of the Associated Press of the country. I have the highest respect for him, but I want to discuss, not in a way to be critical but taxation in the District, because he occupies with reference to the other parts of the country an equally prominent place. I will not be personal, because I have no personal feeling in the matter. In fact, I have only sought to place frankly before the House the facts unanimously found by the committee.

CLEVELAND

Cleveland's adjusted local tax rate is $2.31 per $100, so the Cleveland Plain Dealer pays $23,000 on every million dollars of property compared with Mr. Noyes's Star, that pays only $15,300, or approximately 50 per cent more is paid for the privilege of living in Cleveland instead of the Capital City. The Cleveland Press, with all other Cleveland taxpayers, pay at the same rate, and in addition these Cleveland papers pay their proportion of the $9,500,000 that Mr. Noyes urges for contribution to meet District's expenses caused by his own extremely low taxes.

BALTIMORE

The Baltimore Sun and News, only 40 miles distant, in addition to paying double gas and automobile tax license fees compared with Mr. Noyes's paper, pays $2.34 per $100 for real property, or $23,400 on every million dollars of real estate and personal property, if fortunate enough to own that amount, compared with $15,300 paid by Noyes, or $8,100 less is paid by the president of the Associated Press, who so frequently lampoons Congress on the subject of his taxes.

Baltimore is a fine city to live in, but just what advantages are possessed by the city only 40 miles distant to require it to pay over 50 per cent more taxes on real estate than is paid by Mr. Noyes and other Washington residents has not been explained. It calls for a conscience fund of large size from past records. Why Baltimore should contribute to the $9,500,000 subsidy now paid Washington has never been explained.

BOSTON

As the local publisher revels in statistics, Boston will next be taken with its adjusted tax rate of $29.26 compared to Washington's $15.30 rate per $1,000. Now comes the Boston Post and the American, the Christian Science Monitor and Boston Globe, all metropolitan papers of note, that pay $29,260 in taxes, or $13,900 more on every million dollars of property, or 85 per cent more than is paid by Mr. Noyes in Washington, in actual values based on the adjusted comparison.

No one will depreciate the climate or esthetic surroundings for which the educational Hub is famous, but just why the Christian Science Monitor or Post and hundreds of thousands of taxpayers should pay 85 per cent more taxes, adjusted comparative rates, together with vastly larger gas and automobile license fees than is paid by our eminent friend on Eleventh and Pennsylvania Avenue is not yet explained.

In addition to all this, Boston taxpayers, including the publishers above named, contribute annually $6,587,173 State income tax, or a total tax levy in all more than double that of Washington.

PITTSBURGH

I may go further into this interesting statistical field. The next city, Pittsburgh, pays $26.60 per $1,000 on real estate, compared with Mr. Noyes, who complains over his $15.30 payment. What reason can be given by the president of the Associated Press why his profitable Washington Star only pays $15,300 per million dollars on its investment, while the Pittsburgh Press and Post Gazette pay $26,600, or $11,300 more than the District on the same investment, which translated into percentages indicates that the atmospheric conditions of the Smoky City call for a 70 per cent higher tax rate than is paid by Mr. Noyes, who scolds because Congress does not make Pittsburgh pay an additional subsidy so as to increase the amount received by the District from such source to $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 annually instead of $9,500,000 paid last year. It should be borne in mind that these outside publishers and all Pittsburgh taxpayers also aid with their contributions to the District in addition to the taxes they now pay.

Now, I take the city of Milwaukee, and I know something about Milwaukee. It is run, not by a Democrat, not by a Republican, but a Socialist mayor. There is not one word of criticism; he has been elected time after time because he has run the city so effectively and successful, and not one word of graft or extravagance is brought against him.

MILWAUKEE

Milwaukee, the metropolis of my own State, is slightly larger than Washington and prides itself upon its municipal management, unlike that of its neighbor Chicago, and has had no suspicion of city graft or waste or extravagance in recent years. Charges of extravagance alleged to be a normal condition in District of Columbia school and other affairs is at a minimum in Milwaukee. That city pays $26.34 per $1,000 adjusted assessed value on real estate compared with the $15.30 paid by Mr. Noyes, or $11 excess on every $1,000—nearly 70 per cent higher in Milwaukee than in Washington. This is also apart from the difference in fees to be paid by the gas tax, which is double in Wisconsin, and the automobile tax which is a thousand per cent more than that paid in the District.

Again this is only a beginning of the comparison, for Milwaukee paid in 1930, $7,542,403 additional State income tax. The difference in increased percentages borne by the metropolis of my State is apparent at a glance. Yet there is no reason known to the average citizen of Milwaukee why there should be 70 per cent more real estate and personal property taxes paid in Milwaukee by all its taxpayers than in Washington, but that is submitted for the consideration of the distinguished president of the Associated Press. In fact, many people living elsewhere would say that such evidences constantly presented to the surrounding country indicate a plain case of tax favoritism for those who defend the District tax rates.

The only justifiable answer that can be made is that Congress, and Congress alone, is responsible for the District tax rate and should answer to itself for the unjust comparisons above cited.

BUFFALO

Buffalo is in a State that pays to the Federal Government ninety-nine times as much as it receives back in State subsidies. Buffalo is slightly larger than Washington and pays $27.67 per $1,000 valuation on Buffalo real estate, compared with $15.30 paid on every $1,000 by Mr. Noyes, publisher of the Washington Star, or otherwise stated, the New York tax collected on real property is over 75 per cent higher for Buffalo than Washington, based on the same comparable assessed valuation. When Buffalo's tax collector faces the disbursing officer of the Buffalo Courier-Express and the Buffalo Times and every other Buffalo taxpayer, he says in unmistakable terms, "You will please plank down $27.67 on every $1,000 in real estate you own, because Mr. Noyes, president of the Associated Press, protests so loudly against paying $15.30 for a like amount of property in Washington that Congress seems afraid to make a proper tax adjustment."

Another factor appears when Buffalo not only pays 75 per cent higher real-estate taxes than Washington, including far higher automobile taxes, but it pays $1,683,209 in State income taxes in addition to Federal income and personal-property taxes paid by other States. It also helps support the $9,500,000 fund demanded by the District publisher in addition to its 75 per cent heavier local tax for the privilege of living in New York State.

MINNEAPOLIS

Minneapolis has a population of 464,753 and Washington has 486,869, so it is a comparable case. Minneapolis has many summer advantages and is a fine city, but I doubt if any Minneapolitan would say his home city has the year round advantages over the Capital City of the country that receives $200,000,000 regularly from the Federal Government for its employees and other purposes, and has many other advantages over any other city in the world.

The parks of each city are beautiful and extensive, but many of the parks in Washington are cared for by the Federal Government, whereas Minneapolis pays for all as it goes. The Minnesota law provides for a 40 per cent assessment, which District witnesses dwelt upon with emphasis in the hearings without enlightening the committee about the tax rate paid of 73.9 per cent compared to Washington's 15.3 per cent rate.

On the adjusted tax rate, wherein assessments and a tax rate of 75 per cent in Minneapolis are reduced to a common denominator with Washington, it is shown that while Washington pays $15.30 per thousand in taxes that Minneapolis pays $28.54 per thousand, or 75 per cent more than Washington. Why?

The Minneapolis Journal and Minneapolis Tribune are found paying $28,540 per million dollars in Minnesota for the same valued property on which Mr. Noyes pays only $15,300 in Washington. All the explanations and smoke screens in the world can not confuse these figures; for in addition to its local taxes so paid the taxpayers in these outside cities contribute to the support of the District's normal maintenance because Mr. Noyes, president of the Associated Press, and other residents do not pay their fair share of taxes according to the adjusted rates quoted.

I am presenting facts, and I do not question the motive of those that do not want to pay taxes. To the gentleman from New Jersey, who is just leaving the Chamber, I want to say that 100 per cent more in taxes is paid by cities of New Jersey than is paid in the city of Washington on personal and real property.

NEWARK AND JERSEY CITY

Newark, N. J., with 442,337 population, compared with Washington, pays on adjusted rate on full value of $28.54 per thousand, or more than 80 per cent higher than Washington, $15.30, and the News, Ledger, and Star Eagle of that city have a right to be heard in protest of Mr. Noyes's taxes, which enable him, in addition, to exact from Congress $9,500,000 in order to preserve the low tax rate of $15.30 which is paid in the District.

Jersey City, in the same State, pays into the Federal Treasury more than $60 for every dollar returned in shape of any State subsidy and is a shining mark with its adjusted tax rate in that city disclosed to be $29.55, or practically double the $15.30 paid in Washington.

LOUISVILLE

Louisville, Ky., another comparable city, has an adjusted tax rate of $30.80, or more than 100 per cent higher than the $15.30 rate paid by Washington on the same adjusted valuation and rate basis, in addition to contributions toward District subsidies and higher auto and gas rates.

The Jersey Journal, Courier Journal and Louisville Times, and all Louisville taxpayers have real complaints to make against the president of the Associated Press, who uses his Washington Star and his own prestige as president to compel these Louisville papers to contribute toward the $9,500,000 for the support of the District so he can be relieved from his fair share of taxes, of which he pays, in comparison, only 50 per cent.

MEMPHIS

The Memphis Appeal, from the State of my colleague [Mr. DAVIS], and the Press-Scimitar, of the same city of Memphis, sound their appeals on deaf ears and wave their scimitars without effect. For the past 20 years they have been paying nearly double the taxes collected from the president of the Associated Press and publisher of the Washington Star, and what is true of these papers is equally true of every Memphis taxpayer.

The adjusted rate is found to be $28.94 per thousand dollars for Memphis, compared with $15.30 for Washington, or about 80 per cent higher in addition to other high license and gas expenses heretofore mentioned.

Senators and Members of Congress who wink at injustice to the rest of the country get laudatory notices from the Star for their "fairness," but what right have they to rob Peter to pay Paul in order to insure the publicity puffs given out by the president of the Associated Press for these Senators and Members.

In this discussion I have taken only certain cities that in many ways seemed comparable to Washington, but it would be unfair to say that all cities that pay more taxes are proportionately so much higher than Washington. New York, presumably, would go above any of the figures quoted, while Dallas, Alexandria, Fairfax, and other towns not especially favored in Federal surroundings like the Capital City may pay nearer the Washington rate. Yet adjusted tax receipts in the average city, whether large or small, I submit, will show a higher rate paid than in Washington.

It is repeated that all the other 22 cities, based on the adjusted tax rate, pay more taxes than the city of Washington. Reaching an average for the 22 cities, the adjusted tax rate is about $24.21 a thousand dollars, or over 60 per cent higher than that collected in the District. Instead of paying 60 per cent higher tax for its superior advantages, the city now pays approximately that percentage below the average of those making contribution for its support.

Leaving out of consideration the manifold special advantages enjoyed by every resident of Washington over that had by residents of other cities, the taxpayers of this city enjoy the luxury of living in a city of unequaled beauty of surroundings the world over, where approximately $200,000,000 is spent annually by the Federal Government, giving constant business and labor stability unknown elsewhere in this or any other country, and yet the Capital City pays less taxes than any of the other cities, all of which contribute liberally to the District support to make annual deficit.

It is that contribution which now makes an increased demand on Congress for a larger subsidy or dole. Included in the Star's news columns are protests from Brightwood, Takoma Park, Swampoodle, and other admirers and followers who so frequently and loudly resolute to Congress without any conception of the real facts because they only read the Washington Star. A fine gentleman, personally, is Mr. Noyes, but from comparisons quoted he is mistaken in his facts so frequently given to the public through the columns of his Washington Star. I assume his apology for mistakes will come in the same mail with the letter expected from Mr. Gardiner that goes to the President.

The average tax rate adjusted as to valuations and local rates of 22 cities including Washington is stated as $24.20 per thousand instead of $15.30 now paid by the District. On District real estate of $1,182,463,345 a rate of $24 instead of $15.30 will increase the amount collected to that of other cities.

The National Capital does not belong to the District of Columbia but to all the States that pay their just taxes, without evasion. These comparisons are submitted to the president of the Associated Press and those who have been following his argument in order that he may consent to a fair adjustment of taxes to support the District of Columbia.

No Member seeks to criticize the publisher of the Star or the Washington Post or other news critics on the tremendous savings in taxes they have helped to bring about for themselves. Tax rates for all publishers in the District are alike, but the country is entitled to know that District papers pay approximately 40 per cent less than are paid by various comparable cities quoted, based on the best available testimony before the committees which after examination has been accepted in full by the committee. That is the unanimous finding of the committee.

Of course, Congress and neither Mr. Noyes, Mr. McLean, nor any other individual is to blame for the almost unbelievable tax situation brought about by constant misunderstandings not corrected by the local press. I doubt if any Representative or Senator can find a tax receipt back in his own State that for the same comparative-valued property in Washington is not 50 per cent or 100 per cent, and often higher, back home than here. Other added tax burdens will increase the amount far more than that stated.

We may desire to give liberally to the District, and I am not questioning that policy; but as one appointed to ascertain the facts without prejudice, I believe the District should pay its fair share for the maintenance of the city of Washington.

It has been openly argued that Senators and Representatives owning property in the District can be depended upon to refuse any readjustment of taxes. That is an inference, if at all, that a financial tax benefit to them will govern their judgment and action. It is a reflection on any property owner who is an official of the Government to so argue.

As an evidence of arguments offered by the local press to drive Senators and Representatives into support of the present indefensible annual tax avoidance of $14,000,000, which the committee has demonstrated should be added to District tax rolls, I attach extract from a news clipping, Washington Post of November 30, 1930:

MANY LAWMAKERS HAVE HOMES HERE

To-day nearly 100 Members of Congress own their own homes in Washington or in nearby Maryland and Virginia, and the sum they pay in taxes helps a lot to run the local government.

A great many things explain this—more attractive homes, the automobile (which permits Members to live long distances from Capitol Hill and yet get there in short time), and high-class school system in Washington.

There is many a young man or young woman the son or daughter of a Member of Congress who has received his or her entire education in this city.

Then follow the names of 24 Senators, with their political affiliations and State represented.

Also 34 Representatives in Congress, with the notation:

The lists bear the names of a number of Members who own property but who give apartment homes or hotels as their address in the Congressional Directory.

That published statement clearly calls attention to the supposed influence some personal interest may have in the judgment of those so listed.

An editorial from the same paper on December 7, 1931, at the opening of this Congress, contains additional editorial advice, offering novel arguments, usually made by the local press whenever efforts occur to correct self-evident tax favoritism extended by Congress to the District. The editorial says among other things:

It seems to be the attitude on Capitol Hill that residents of the District should pay as much taxes as do residents of other cities, regardless of other factors involved. This is not logic nor reason, but politics. Congressmen love to return to their home districts and tell how they "have soaked" the voteless Capital with taxes. Such an attitude makes a farce of every gesture that is made to adjust the costs of maintaining Washington on an equitable basis.

No member of the committee and presumably no Member of Congress from either branch has ever believed in or expressed views found in the editorial. Only a just share of tax burdens has been asked from the District, as well as from 435 other districts in the 48 States which are contributing to a district that does not pay taxes equal to those paid by any comparable city in the country.

Nowhere in the committee hearings or elsewhere will be found any warrant for believing Senators or Members are influenced in District tax matters by self-interest nor by any desire to do injustice to the District. Possibly a comparable tax recommendation for the $3,000,000 Post properties in Washington and on other property belonging to its publisher, now a resident of Latvia, Europe, may have influenced the editorial writer, but in the interests of independent and orderly legislation it is to be regretted that Members assigned without desire or knowledge to certain legislative duties should be subjected to a charge of motives of self-interest or prejudice when engaged in the study of District matters.

The committee's finding is that the gas tax must be doubled to meet that in surrounding States, and on the average it is below the average rate in the country. Motor vehicles are to be taxed, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS], on the Democratic side, is going to deal with that question. In my State motor vehicles pay something like $14 on the average, and yet you get your license here for $1 and a small personal-property tax.

The estate tax, as I said, is practically all returned to the District, so that they will pay only one estate tax. That is equally true of the income tax, which, of course, takes the place of the intangible tax now paid. So that you have practically only the motor-vehicle tax and the gas tax added to District tax burdens. I believe a real-estate and personal-property tax ought to be imposed to a larger extent, but we are not going to attempt to do that here. However, there is a legislative committee of the House on District affairs that ought to make a study of that phase of the question and undertake to remedy the present situation.

Mr. REILLY. Has the gentleman the assessed value of the non-Government property?

Mr. FREAR. Yes. All of that is presented in the report and it is in my minority report. I think that is all I have to say at this time. [Applause.]

A STUDY IN TAX OFFSETS

Mr. Murphy, chief expert in the Bureau of Efficiency, was testifying as to the method he pursued in estimating Federal Government tangibles and intangibles reached a total of $180,000,000.

Bearing in mind that nowhere else in the world has any such preposterous method been followed in trying to match up Federal, personal, and intangibles against a properly taxable community, I submit the following "expert" tax opinion that now bolsters up the District tax situation:

Mr. MURPHY. The Bureau of Efficiency made a request on the various Government establishments to report the value—that is, the cost—of the equipment and machinery, and so forth, which is owned and used in connection with the Government's operations. On the basis of these reports, which excluded the contents of the Capitol, the contents of the Congressional Library, the contents of the Smithsonian Institute, and Army Medical Museum, we arrived at a figure of $180,000,000 for the value of the personal property devoted to this use.

Mr. FREAR. What property did you include?

Mr. MURPHY. We included the property in all the Federal establishments that we had classified in our first list as being devoted to general Government needs, and the property which they were using which would be taxable if privately owned.

Mr. FREAR. That is, the desks and everything, the furniture and everything in the buildings?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes; machinery and everything of that kind. Now that $180,000,000 is the cost of that new. Of course, it was in various stages of depreciation and we took one-half of its value, or $90,000,000, as a basis for a tangible property tax.

Mr. FREAR. That was all arbitrarily based; I am trying to ascertain just what you used, how you arrived at your figure. It is arbitrarily based by your commission or your board of efficiency?

Mr. MURPHY. You mean the 50 per cent?

Mr. FREAR. Yes. Both that and the fact that you reached the basis of $180,000,000 by including all the furniture. I mean, have you had any figures of that kind from anyone else?

Mr. MURPHY. Of course, the figures we used were the figures and values of the various departments and establishments. We did not put our own figures on it. We took theirs.

* * * * * * *

Mr. FREAR. Then you took half of that?

Mr. MURPHY. Then we were confronted with the problem of what part should be used as the valuation for tax purposes. We know in personal property the valuation is scaled down materially, and we scaled it down 50 per cent and arrived at the figure $90,000,000 in that way. Of course, we could not include the property of the Army Medical Museum and the Smithsonian, because nobody could value that.

Mr. FREAR. I am not criticizing; I am trying to get the method you followed.

Mr. MURPHY. Now, we were confronted with the problem of determining what basis should fairly be used to determine the amount for intangibles. Obviously, any effort to determine the value of intangible property of the Federal Government on the same basis that is used for private individuals would be unsatisfactory. You could not take all of the debts due the United States from foreign countries and railroads, and all the cash in the Treasury on a given date and take one-half of 1 per cent of that, so we felt that we might arrive at a basis for determining this that would not be unfair to the Federal Government and would not be unfair to the District of Columbia government, and we made an examination of the tax returns of the principal business concerns in Washington to find the relationship between the value they reported for personal property and the value they reported for intangibles. Taking a group of those, we found that the values were approximately the same.

Mr. FREAR. That is, between the personal property and the intangibles?

Mr. MURPHY. That is right. So we inserted $90,000,000 as a valuation of the intangible property on which one-half of 1 per cent would be computed.

Mr. FREAR. That was the Government's share of intangibles. Now, will you go in detail and show what that consists of? Can you in any way show what this $90,000,000 of intangibles is that the Government is taxed for, or so set off and put into this estimate?

The CHAIRMAN. That was a purely arbitrary figure, was it not, Mr. Murphy?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes. It was out of the question, in our judgment, to attempt—I can tell you this, that for 1932 the amount of tax we arrived at, one-half of 1 per cent, is $451,000. That is part of the nine or ten million dollars.

Mr. FREAR. I feel that you are entitled for your own sake to make that more definite as to what would be considered. You say you could not arrive at the question of foreign debts, which, of course, is certainly true. No one ever anticipated that that would be considered. But what did you take as personal property of the Government? Did you take the gold and silver that is up in the Treasury Department?

Mr. MURPHY. That comes under intangibles. That is why I explained we thought we could not possibly take the cash balance in the Treasury from day to day.

Mr. FREAR. In personal property?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes; money and credits come under intangibles which I explained we thought we could not possibly take and get any satisfactory results, so we have attempted to offer for the consideration of the committee this other as a basis for arriving at it, which we feel is not unfair to either the District of Columbia or the Federal Government.

Mr. FREAR. That is $90,000,000 for Government intangibles?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. I think this is important to be made a matter of record, that you arbitrarily say that because the business property of the city has an intangible value of a certain amount, the same amount of intangible property to personal property should apply to the Government that the private business has. That is right, is it not?

Mr. MURPHY. We arrive at the assessed valuation of intangibles on the basis of the actual assessed valuation of the tangibles.

Mr. FREAR. In private business?

Mr. MURPHY. No; in the Federal Government. We obtained a figure of $90,000,000 as the actual assessed valuation of the tangible personal property. Now, we arrived at the assessed valuation of the intangibles by taking an equal amount after having determined from a group of business returns that their reports showed that the assessed valuations of their tangibles and their intangibles were about the same.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; of course. Now, I am asking, we can take intangibles, stocks and bonds and matters of that kind that are held by private individuals, and we can very readily ascertain a correct statement of them; but what did you consider of the Government, outside of simply saying, "We will take the same rate that private individuals have"?

Mr. MURPHY. That is all. We are trying to put the Government in the same position as another business concern here, as far as the property which is used, both real and personal, is concerned.

Mr. FREAR. Do governments have the same intangibles in proportion as private individuals? Is that the suggestion?

Mr. MURPHY. No. The suggestion is that the business concern will have the same proportion as the Government.

Mr. FREAR. You have taken that arbitrarily; but have you had any estimates from any particular source? Is that true of any city that you know of?

Mr. MURPHY. In regard to intangibles?

Mr. FREAR. In regard to intangibles of the municipal government or of any government abroad or here?

Mr. MURPHY. We have no data on that; no.

Mr. FREAR. You have just assumed that?

Mr. MURPHY. That is all.

In discussing the efficiency commission's peculiar intellectual bent when trying to support the District of Columbia's contention that Federal property should be offset on the tax roll, I attach a brief extract from testimony in hearings of Congressman Browne that expresses a general estimate of the offset contention, as follows:

Mr. BROWNE. Let us accept the District of Columbia valuation of the Government property and charge 5 or 6 per cent for the use of parks. Let us go a little further. The Federal Government owns the streets of the city of Washington, in fee and not in use. The Government property should have a tax paid on it. Then, let us charge rent for the use of the streets. I can show you streets that are worth $100 a square foot. The whole value of the adjacent property rests on the free use of those streets. Let us be logical and have a sequence to our argument. Let us not be all one sided. Let us balance it. If the Government holdings can be taxed, then the Government can collect rent.

Mr. FREAR. From whom?

Mr. BROWNE. From the District, which uses it. There is the logic. Let us carry this logic a little further.

Mr. FREAR. They suggest it is used by outsiders as well as the District, because of the location of the Federal Capital.

Mr. BROWNE. It is in evidence and established anyway, just as any street in any part of the country, the District of Columbia people travel through the streets and roads in Washington and through Baltimore and through Virginia. So that goes both ways.

Mr. DAVIS. It is also a fact, is it not, that visitors to the city are always welcome because they spend their money in Washington?

Mr. BROWNE. They pay handsomely all the time they are there, and the District business houses and hotels get the money. I have no doubt there would be many places glad to welcome home the Federal Government of the United States if it spent $100,000,000 a year in the community. I am merely following what I consider an absurd point of view to its logical conclusions. We tax our intangibles. If we have money in the bank on the 30th of June there will be an assessment on it. It is an intangible. Why not tax the balance in the Treasury? It is the same thing.

Mr. FREAR. That has been suggested.

Mr. BROWNE. Four or five hundred million dollars. Why not put an income tax on the Government's income—carry the absurdity to the logical conclusion?

Mr. FREAR. It has been suggested to the committee by the Bureau of Efficiency it is difficult to obtain the exact indebtedness of the Government and to take a blanket of $90,000,000 intangibles as an equivalent.

Mr. DAVIS. Now, carrying that analysis further, if, as suggested by you, we accept the theory that the Government should respond in a manner either directly or indirectly as a taxpayer on its property in the Capital, what would be a proper basis for the payment of taxes on property like the Capitol and the Smithsonian Institution, the National Museum, and Zoological Gardens, and so forth?

Mr. BROWNE. If we accept that argument, the basis would be like the basis of any taxes—on the theory of what they are worth. And while we are about it, why exempt anything—churches, charitable institutions, and other benevolent institutions—and put taxes on them. They are benevolent institutions, and so is the Federal Government a benevolent institution.

I will be glad to give my opinion on anything that comes up. As long as we keep our feet on the fundamental economics we will not go astray.

Mr. Chairman, most of the Members of this House are to some extent students of taxation, as necessarily they have to be in the positions they occupy in the various districts. I think they will be interested in reading what I have attached here to my remarks from this Bureau of Efficiency expert, who was before us for several days. I call it a study in tax effects. He attempts to show why they should offset something like $500,000,000 worth of Federal Government property in this District-tax question.

It should be kept in mind that the Government does not have its property in Washington taken care of by the District of Columbia. The Government has its own policemen. The Government built the water plant here, and that was undertaken as a Federal activity. Of course, some expenditures may be made by the District of Columbia for the Federal Government, and the District ought to be paid for that, and no one will question that; but that does not enter into this, it is not an element for consideration at all. I do not think that any Member sitting on this floor will oppose any appropriation that is intended to beautify the city of Washington and make it what it is to-day, the most beautiful capital I have ever been in, and I have been in all of the European capitals, with one or two exceptions.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The Government of the United States pays for the policemen in the Capitol and the House Office Building and the Agriculture Department and the park police and various other police. The Government pays for them exclusively.

Mr. FREAR. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I believe the gentleman pointed out in his speech yesterday that if the tax burden of the people of the District was equalized with that of people living in comparable cities, there would be no necessity for this Federal contribution.

Mr. FREAR. Fourteen million dollars, I stated yesterday, by the findings of the committee, would be raised in addition to what they pay now, whereas they now get $9,500,000 annual dole, and that has been reduced by the committee because of raising $4,000,000 by offered bills to $6,500,000. I can see no necessity for even that amount. A total increased tax of $10,000,000 ought to be sufficient to meet the District's needs, and if not, then I shall vote for everything that is reasonable for the District.

I shall not take more time of the committee now, for I expect to speak briefly upon the matter of the estate tax later.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, this week seems to be wash day for the Republican organization. We Democrats are not concerned with their washing out of their dirty linen. The most serious criticisms of President Hoover that have been made in the other end of the Capitol have come from an old-line stand-pat Republican. The most serious charges against and criticisms of President Hoover that have been made in this Chamber come from the Republican chairman of that great Committee on Banking and Currency, and he has been the Republican chairman of that committee for several years until the present Congress.

Whatever have been the conditions prevailing in this country for the past 10 years, culminating in the present unprecedented depression, the people of the United States have now a ray of hope. From day to day, I predict, and I have been fairly close to the business men of this Nation, that the business men of the United States engaged in legitimate business are going to have more and more respect and confidence for the leader of this House. He is going to instill confidence into the business affairs of the country. The people are going to know that the legitimate enterprises will get a square deal, and that the illegitimate ones are going to be called to a halt from now on, and that the people have safeguards aplenty as long as we have JOHN GARNER in the Speaker's chair. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to insert at this point a short editorial from the Bridgeport Post concerning Speaker GARNER.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

[Bridgeport Post, December 15, 1931]

THE SPEAKER'S CAR

One prominent Democrat has set an example for lesser Democrats to follow.

JOHN N. GARNER, of Texas, newly elected Speaker of the House of Representatives, has refused to accept the use of the handsome motor car that has gone with the House Speakership for many years.

Congressman GARNER figures that he can save the Nation between $5,000 and $7,500 a year. He and Mrs. Garner, he explains, have found that they can readily take a trolley from their modest apartment and within a short distance of the Capitol can complete the trip "in one of those 20-cent taxis."

Besides, having the official car involves an official chauffeur in attendance at the Capitol entrance, waiting for the Speaker to emerge. "And I don't want any man hanging around waiting for me," says the democratic Mr. GARNER.

When the late Nicholas Longworth was alive and the make-up of the present Congress had not yet been determined, Speaker Longworth and his minority rival, Mr. GARNER, used to spoof each other a good deal about the official car and who would have the use of it in the present session. The division appeared so close that they compromised by calling it "our car."

Mr. Longworth is dead and Mr. GARNER has become the majority spokesman in troublous times. His act in rejecting the car, simple as it is—and theatrical as some critics may say it is—sets a good example. It strikes the right note.

After all, why shouldn't our public officials, from the President down, furnish and pay for their own cars if they must have cars? This business of providing luxurious equipage for our well-paid public servants to ride in never had any real sanction either in economy or common sense.

Mr. BLANTON. You are going to see commendatory editorials such as the above coming forth from every Republican paper in the land before this year terminates. For Mr. Speaker GARNER deserves it.

Mr. SHANNON. Which Bridgeport?

Mr. BLANTON. Bridgeport, Conn., the State from which hails our good friend Mr. TILSON. It is a leading daily from a strong Republican State.

I asked the other day the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER]—and there is no finer gentleman in this House—about an editorial that came from that staunch Republican newspaper, the Akron Beacon-Journal. It was trying to shunt Mr. Hoover aside as the Republican nominee next year and to substitute Mr. Coolidge as your standard bearer. And in such connection it carried a cartoon that had attached to it its own loud speaker. The gentleman from Ohio did not seem to remember it. It was a very short editorial.

The accusations which are coming against the Republican administration are not coming from Democrats. They are coming from Republicans. I do not blame my friend from Maine, Mr. BEEDY, for trying to iron them out this morning. Mr. BEEDY is a graduate of the Yale Law School.

Mr. BEEDY has been on various debating teams; for instance, on the Yale-Harvard debating team, the Yale-Princeton debating team. He has been on debating teams all over the New England States. He is a profound lawyer. He has been a distinguished district attorney in his district, and he has had a record than which there is no better in New England for prosecuting people who need prosecution. He is a wonderful prosecutor, but he is a poor defender. I presume you gentlemen picked the best lawyer that you had as a defender on your side, next to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD].

All of this defense commotion is unnecessary. When the President of the United States was disturbed about prohibition, when he could not answer all of his callers from New York who daily visited him on that subject, he appointed a commission to attend to that proposition for him, and with the report of his Wickersham Commission he has appeased the people of the United States—"wets" and "drys"—so that they are no longer concerned on that question. [Laughter.]

When the Navy League attacked the President and made accusation after accusation, the distinguished President of the United States, as was his wont, referred that to a specially selected commission, duly appointed, and they brought in a report clearing the President. [Laughter.] Now he is cleared of those Navy accusations. To-morrow he is going to appoint a commission to take up the accusations made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, his erstwhile Republican chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. McFADDEN]. [Laughter.] And in due time they will be passed on to the satisfaction of the American people. So why take up the time of this House washing out the Republican dirty linen? Why do you not take up the debate on these four splendid bills presented by this splendid committee, headed by our splendid colleague from Michigan, Mr. MAPES, and debate these bills?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Why does the gentleman not set a good example and start right now?

Mr. BLANTON. I intend to do that. There are many new Members who may not be acquainted with our friend from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], of Hudson, Wis. I was here where he crossed swords with one of the strongest men of this House. It was a most memorable fight. It was with no less an antagonist than the distinguished former Member and Speaker of this House, Mr. Nicholas Longworth, of Ohio. You older Members remember that great fight on the dye schedules, the debate on one side led by Mr. Longworth, and on the other side by the gentleman from Wisconsin, and Mr. FREAR won the debate. He got enough votes on both sides of the aisle to uphold him in it. While he has been a Republican all these years, I have followed him on many fights, and I am following him now on the only speech that has been made on the present legislation that is before the House. He is a safe man to follow on propositions of this kind. [Laughter.]

Mr. FREAR. Why make any reservations? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman were not on the wrong side of the aisle there would be no reservations. [Laughter.] If my judgment is good, if the party to which the gentleman belongs continues in the way it has been going for the last 10 years, not only the gentleman from Hudson, Wis., but the entire Wisconsin delegation and other delegations from the western part of the United States are going to cross this aisle and we will have to move that middle door at least one section down, and move our aisle westward to accommodate the new Democratic Members. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas 10 additional minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. For over 12 years' service here I never took a vacation. I spent every single interval between sessions of Congress in Washington investigating bureaus and commissions and independent offices and departments of Government. I went down there and had them show me where the money was going that we were appropriating here by hundreds of millions. I had them show me their methods of doing business.

In some investigations I had as many as 10 different people working for me, helping me gather the facts. And I had to pay them out of my own pocket. Incidentally, in checking up all Government business I investigated District matters. At that time these favored people in Washington were paying only 80 cents on every $100, as a total tax for everything, including water, streets, and schools. That covered every tax they paid—80 cents on the hundred dollars, because the people of the United States, through Congress, paid all of the other civic expenses for them out of the Public Treasury. The Members of Congress had given Washington what they called a 50-50 plan. The Government paid half of all street paving; paid half of all sewer connections; paid half of all the Metropolitan police force; paid half of all the fire protection; paid half of the salaries of all the trash gatherers, garbage gatherers, ash gatherers, street cleaners; paid for the water; and paid half of every other civic expense of this great city. Property rose in value here, and because of that you found tax evaders moving from every part of the United States to Washington. The tax on intangibles was only one-half of 1 per cent. You found multimillionaires coming to Washington with millions of dollars in their bank boxes in securities that were not touched by taxes, and then we began to fight that. I found many situations interwoven in District affairs that were intolerable. And I made an uncompromising fight to rectify them. Naturally I incurred the enmity of individuals and officials I investigated.

But no man can accomplish anything without making somebody mad. When I was judge of the forty-second judicial district of Texas and cleaned the congested dockets by dispatching business, I made some easy-going lawyers mad. But nevertheless, I cleaned up the court dockets in my five counties—Eastland, Stephens, Callahan, Shackleford, and Taylor. I incurred the special emnity of a lawyer named Dallas Scarborough. When my 4-year term expired he made an attempt to get me off the bench. He announced as a candidate against me for the office. We had a memorable joint debate at Ranger, Tex., and I ran him out of the campaign. But he has never forgiven me. He has opposed me for over 20 years. Every time I have run for Congress I have had to defeat not only the men who were in the race against me, but also this Mr. Scarborough. He has criticized me for this, and for that. He has incited and helped candidates to run against me. He has continually meddled in my affairs. He has repeated and helped to circulate adverse newspaper criticisms against me. He has just recently written a snooping letter to an official here in Washington seeking information about my office which he could have gotten from me for the asking. I always carry his old home county of Callahan almost solidly. I am willing for my office employees to tell him something about my work here.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in my remarks four short statements by employees who have worked for me—some for a long time. They are about one page each.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

AFFIDAVITS OF EMPLOYEES

WASHINGTON,
District of Columbia:

I, Mrs. Louise Kennedy Marx, being duly sworn, upon oath state: I am Congressman THOMAS L. BLANTON'S secretary, in charge of his Washington office. I am not related to him in any way. Excepting a few intervals, I have been his secretary since April, 1917. During the short time he was out of Congress following his campaign for the United States Senate he "loaned" me to Congressman Spearing, of Louisiana, whose secretary I was until Mr. BLANTON returned to Congress.

I am a graduate of the Abilene High School and attended business college there, and my parents and sister still live in Abilene, Tex.

I draw a salary of $2,000 per annum, and Congressman BLANTON gives me a vacation of one month off each summer on full salary, and he pays for the substitute who does my work while I am absent.

For more than 10 years Congressman BLANTON took no vacations but devoted the entire intervals Congress was not in session to making close, careful, exhaustive investigations of all departments, bureaus, commissions, and independent offices of the Government, familiarizing himself in minute detail with their manner of spending public money and their methods of transacting business. This cost him much money.

He has never been on a junket. His check-ups caused several high officials to lose their positions. He has worked day and night in numerous important hearings and is well posted on every feature of Government business, which is of incalculable value to him in his efforts to keep waste and extravagance out of all bills. I know that since 1917 he has spent several thousand dollars of his own money in making investigations, and he has paid out for clerical help far more than his Government allowance.

All of his various employees who have worked for him like him and are still his loyal friends. Miss Ruby Saylors, who has worked for him for the past three years, is his private secretary in charge of his Abilene office, which he maintains specially to assist ex-service men.

He has recently been rewarded by being elected a member of the important Committee on Appropriations, a position long sought by him.

(Mrs.) LOUISE KENNEDY MARX.

Sworn to and subscribed by the said Mrs. Louise Kennedy Marx before me on this the 16th day of December, A. D. 1931, in Washington, D. C.

[SEAL.] W. G. LADD,
Notary Public in and for the District of Columbia.

THE STATE OF TEXAS,
County of Taylor:

I, Ruby Saylors, being duly sworn upon my oath, state: For the past three years continuously I have been the private secretary of Congressman THOMAS L. BLANTON. I am in charge of his Texas office, while his secretary, Mrs. Louise Marx, a graduate of the Abilene High School, is in charge of his Washington office. He pays me $150 per month with his own personal checks. I am not related to him.

When it developed that many sick and disabled veterans and widows, children, and dependent fathers and mothers of veterans were unable to obtain merited compensation because they had no one to properly prepare their papers for them or to help them secure needed evidence and that they were unable through letters properly to explain their cases, Congressman BLANTON at his own expense opened local offices in his district, and pays $600 per year rental for two rooms in the Alexander Building, at Abilene, devoted to official business, thus giving his constituents an opportunity to be heard and to personally explain their business. He has taught me how to prepare their papers for them, and pays all expense incident to qualifying me as a notary public, and he furnishes free notary service to all of them, and constituents from every county in his district come to the Abilene office for consultation and assistance.

Under his guidance and direction I prepare the applications and affidavits and fill in the required Government forms for disabled veterans, their widows and dependent parents, and administer the oath required, so that the papers may go to Congressman BLANTON in good shape. I draw for them their affidavits of fact to be executed by witnesses scattered over the United States. I secure certificates of marriage records, certificates of death, birth certificates, transcripts of probate proceedings and of divorce decrees, and certificates of adoption, and I properly prepare their papers for them so that Congressman BLANTON may obtain needed redress for them from the Government; and he obtains for many of them duplicates of lost discharges and of lost adjusted-compensation certificates. When minor sons run off from home and join the Army or Navy, or when emergent necessities require the immediate return of adult sons, I prepare for their mothers and fathers proper applications and affidavits of needed witnesses, so that Congressman BLANTON may get such sons discharged and sent home promptly. I am an Abilene girl, and am not related in any way to Congressman BLANTON. I have worked in his Washington office, and know that he labors incessantly for his constituents.

RUBY SAYLORS.

Sworn to and subscribed by the said Ruby Saylors before me on this the 1st day of December, A. D. 1931. Given under my hand and seal of office in Abilene, Tex.

[SEAL.] KATE RATHMELL,
Notary Public in and for Taylor County, Tex.

The STATE OF TEXAS,
County of Taylor:

I, Louise Logsdon, being duly sworn, upon oath, state: I am employed by Congressman THOMAS L. BLANTON as mailing clerk for his office. I succeeded Miss Alleyne Osborne, an Abilene girl, who held this position until she married. Congressman BLANTON pays me my salary with his own personal checks.

I have mailed out over 80,000 farmers' bulletins that he secured from the Agricultural Department to his constituents in his district. They have contained valuable instructions on Canning Fruits and Vegetables at Home; How to Mix Plain Concrete for Farm Use; Farm Terracing; Swine Production; Fitting Dresses and Blouses; Raising Chickens, Turkeys, and Other Poultry; Proper Food for Young Children; Beautifying the Farmstead; Marketing Farm Produce; Use of Parcel Post; and many other subjects, which are constantly called for by constituents.

I have mailed out many educational bulletins and data to the teachers in Congressman BLANTON's district, and mail out continually veterans' laws, and different rules and regulations of the United States Veterans' Administration to the veterans of different wars who call for them. Congressman BLANTON maintains at his own expense two rooms in the Alexander Building devoted exclusively to official business for which he pays a rental of $600 per year out of his own pocket. I am an Abilene girl, and am not in any way related to him. He has two other Abilene girls working for him, Miss Ruby Saylors, who is his private secretary, and Mrs. Louise Marx, who is his secretary in charge of his Washington office both during term time and in vacation, and neither of the two are in any way related to him.

LOUISE LOGSDON.

Sworn to and subscribed by the said Louise Logsdon before me on this the 1st day of December, A. D. 1931. Given under my hand and seal of office at Abilene, Tex.

[SEAL.] RUBY SAYLORS,
Notary Public in and for Taylor County, Tex.

The STATE OF TEXAS,
County of Taylor:

I, Kate Rathmell, being duly sworn, upon my oath state:

I have worked for Congressman THOMAS L. BLANTON as supply when his help was off on summer vacation. He paid me with his own personal checks. I am an Abilene girl, and am not related to him in any way.

In my opinion it is of great benefit to his constituents for Congressman BLANTON to maintain a local office in Abilene, as it affords them an opportunity to be personally heard on their varied business matters, and they can explain and discuss the details of their various cases. I know that his constituents come from different parts of his district to see him.

KATE RATHMELL.

Sworn to and subscribed by said Kate Rathmell before me on this the 1st day of December, A. D. 1931. Given under my hand and seal of office at Abilene, Tex.

[SEAL.] RUBY SAYLORS,
Notary Public, Taylor County, Tex.

Mr. BLANTON. The above will keep Mr. Dallas Scarborough from circulating in my big district unwarranted criticism at a time when I am 2,000 miles away busily engaged in attending to the important Government affairs with which my constituents are vitally concerned.

But we who do our duty here may expect to be criticized. We can not do our duty without opposing measures which others espouse ardently. Every time we stop somebody from doing something they want to do, they will get mad and criticize us. If we are not able to withstand unjust criticism, we have no place here. It is only just criticism that hurts. Unjust criticism may sting for a while, but ultimately it does no harm. We must be willing to dare to do right, and take the political consequences. Our consciences will be clear in any event.

Mr. MAPES's committee is now passing legislation for which I have been making an earnest, uncompromising fight for 15 years. When I began fighting the tax rate here in Washington was only 80 cents on the $100, covering all taxes. When we raised it to 90 cents on the $100 we had this identical criticism from the Washington newspapers. Mr. Multimillionaire Ed McLean, of the Post, did not like it. Mr. Multimillionaire William Randolph Hearst, of the Herald and Times, did not like it. Mr. Theodore Noyes, of the Star, did not like it. But nevertheless we raised it. And then we raised it to $1.10 on the $100, and then again to $1.20 on the $100. And then we made another fight and raised it to $1.40 on the $100. And each step, we who led the fight had to be criticized and crucified by the five daily papers in Washington. And when we Members who had been leading the fight succeeded in raising the rate to $1.70 on the $100, we were all treated shamefully by the Post, Star, Times, and Herald. In the last campaign, when I returned to Congress, there was sent to my district, to be carried by as many of the 64 newspapers published in my district as would carry it, a front-page personal attack made upon me in the Washington Post. And it will be remembered that this is the newspaper whose owner carried the $100,000 in "greenbacks" in his little satchel as a go-between, which caused Mr. Secretary Fall to be condemned a felon.

I can not get fair treatment even through the great Associated Press because of the fights I have made here, for Mr. Noyes is president of the Associated Press. But does that deter me from doing my duty? Does it deter the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]? Has it deterred the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES]? Has it deterred the gentleman from Tennessee, my friend, Judge DAVIS, or my colleague, Mr. PATMAN? No. They have done their duty on this committee in spite of this newspaper criticism.

We through the years have raised the tax from 80 cents to $1.70 on the $100, which Mr. FREAR has correctly stated is the lowest rate of taxation in any comparable city in the world. Yet these five daily newspapers are kicking about it.

Oh, they will chastise us about it, but we are doing our duty. We owe it to our people back home. They are tired of paying Washington taxes.

I love the city of Washington and its people as much as does Mr. Theodore Noyes. I have just as many close personal friends here as has he. I am just as much interested in beautifying the city of Washington and making it the most beautiful city in the world as is Mr. Theodore Noyes or Mr. William Randolph Hearst. I will take just as much interest in it and go just as far with you. I supported my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] in giving you a great parking system for the District, giving you all the money the District needed for a parking system, one of the finest in the world. I have gone all the way down the line, as far as was just and right, but I have insisted that the Government of the United States should no longer pay the civic expenses of the people of Washington, much of which all of our people back home heretofore have had to pay.

Take the water system. Do you know that this Government paid for and owns the original conduit of this system? Do you know that much of the money that has gone into this magnificent water system, one of the best in the world for any large city, has been furnished to a large extent by the Government? You who have residences here get your water for your family for $5.60 a year. Where is the home back in your district that can get water for $5.60 a year? In the summer time in my home city I have in years gone by paid as high as $20 a month for sufficient water to keep trees alive. Here you get it for $5.60 a year. A residence in Washington does not have to pay a 5-cent piece for current sewer connections. After you once pay a nominal charge to connect your property with the sewer you are not charged thereafter. In every other city in the United States you pay so much per month for every connection you have and also pay full cost of installing. I do in my city, and as far as I know that is true everywhere else in Texas and other States. But you pay nothing for current sewer charges here. After you once get your connection you do not pay any more. You do not have any monthly payments or yearly payments. It is all paid for you through this old system which we have had going on here for so long.

I want to take my hat off to this Mapes committee. I think it has rendered a service that is invaluable to the people of the country. I say that the newspapers are not treating the Washington people fairly when they are continually hounding Congress by intimating that we are unjust to Washingtonians. It creates a false idea in the minds of the taxpayers here, when we are just and fair.

You take these 20,000 people here who have not paid their taxes. I heard some time ago that there was an undercurrent here, "Do not pay your taxes. We are going to get Congress to grant a moratorium, and after the moratorium we will have Congress pay them; so do not let us pay our taxes."

I am going to put in the RECORD in a few days a statement from your tax assessor here showing the big corporate interests that have refused to pay their taxes under this hope of a moratorium. I am going to show how much they owe and the exact situation. The tax assessor is against it. He says it would be ruinous to the tax system in this District to grant such a moratorium. Yet these newspapers have insisted on that being done.

Do you know how much that would mean to Mr. Theodore Noyes and his Star? Do you know how much that would mean to Mr. William Randolph Hearst and his Times and Herald? Do you know what that would mean to Mr. Ed McLean and his Washington Post? It would mean a tremendous saving.

Take automobiles. You pay $1 here to register a Rolls-Royce, $1 only; yet that would cost you $25 back in any one of the 48 States. Yet $1 is all you pay here. All of the vehicles and trucks which the Washington Star operates every day to deliver its papers cost Mr. Noyes $1 apiece.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. But automobiles are taxed as property, are they not?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; but I am talking about the $1 which it costs to register an automobile in the District, when back home you pay for registration $12.50 on a Ford and on up on the higher-priced cars.

Congress has been the best friend on earth to Washington. The great trouble is that there are too many of us who own homes here, too many distinguished gentlemen in the other end of the Capitol who own palatial homes here.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. A bill was once introduced by a distinguished gentleman at the other end of the Capitol to appropriate $94,000 to buy a parking system. I went out and investigated it. I took a photographer out there with me.

I found a little cut-over park, with all of the timber cut off it. It was land that belonged to Harry Wardman. I did not blame Harry for wanting to sell it, and I did not blame him for wanting to get a good price for it. I saw a magnificent residence just opposite it. There were a lot of improvements going on there and they were putting on sale some town lots around the residence. I called a cop over and I said, "Officer, who owns that fine residence," and he said, "Senator So-and-so," and it was this same Senator who had introduced that bill, the same one. He was not a Democrat, either, and he is not here any longer. [Laughter.] Of course, our committee did not approve of that bill. They killed it. Why, if you will go out here and look at all of this underbrush and all of this bog that is under this Tiger Bridge you will find it is almost worthless, yet do you know that they once tried to sell that bog to this Government for over $100,000? The members of the District Committee, a few of us, got into our cars and went out there and investigated it. We found out what it was and we stopped that bill. You have got to keep your eyes open, gentlemen of the Congress, when the District is concerned.

You have got to keep your eyes open, gentlemen of the Congress, when District bills come before us. You have got to keep your eyes open when Theodore Noyes and McLean and William Randolph Hearst are fighting for something in Washington. You can just bet your head it is something you ought not to vote for. [Laughter and applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to myself.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the moratorium and controversies on the other side of the aisle have been discussed, and you have heard considerable discussion of the fiscal relations between the Government and the District of Columbia of a general nature and discussion of the work of the committee. I think it is only fair to the membership of the House that you have a brief explanation of the particular bill under consideration.

The bill which we are considering is H. R. 5821, providing for taxation of incomes for the District of Columbia, and is one of four bills which have been introduced in accordance with the report of the special committee appointed during the last term of Congress to investigate and study and make recommendations with respect to fiscal relations between the District of Columbia and the United States.

At the present time there is an intangible property tax in force in the District of Columbia. As you are aware, these taxes are rarely ever very workable or fully enforced. The trend is toward an income tax, and this committee has undertaken to prepare, and the chairman has introduced, a bill which we think is in conformity with the modern provisions of income tax laws.

In arriving at a proper course with respect to all of these features of taxation the committee has studied the laws in force in other States and in other cities of comparable size with Washington, and we have undertaken, to the best of our ability, to adopt the most modern and most satisfactory provisions that are in force, and have undertaken to arrive at about an average of all the different jurisdictions.

Of course, there is a variation in the rates and in the terms of these bills in the different States, and yet, as you will see from an examination of the rates in other States, which are given on the back of the report on this bill, there is pretty close conformity with respect to rates in the different States which have adopted income tax laws.

The bill under consideration, in the first place, fixes an exemption of $1,000 in the case of a single person and $2,500 in the case of a married person living with his or her spouse, and $300 exemption for each dependent child under the age of 18 or other person dependent. These exemptions are somewhat lower than those embraced in the Federal income tax law but are more in keeping with the exemptions of other States with respect to State income tax.

The rates embraced in this bill are 1 per cent upon the first $2,000 of net income.

One and a half per cent on incomes in excess of $2,000 but not in excess of $5,000.

Two per cent of the amount of net income in excess of $5,000, but not in excess of $10,000.

Two and a half per cent of the amount of net income in excess of $10,000, but not in excess of $15,000.

Three per cent of the amount of net income in excess of $15,000, but not in excess of $20,000.

Three and a half per cent of the amount of net income in excess of $20,000, but not in excess of $30,000.

Four per cent of the amount of net income in excess of $30,000, but not in excess of $50,000.

Five per cent of the amount of net income in excess of $50,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I just want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that with so important a bill as the gentleman now has under consideration we have only 20 Republican Members on the floor. Of course, the country is in safe hands as long as that condition prevails.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, do you not suppose the Republicans recognize that fate?

We do not think the taxpayers of the District of Columbia have any just right to complain of the enactment of the pending bill. We think from their viewpoint it is fairer and can be more easily and more economically and more effectively administered than their present law, and we think it will result in parties paying tax who are now escaping the payment of tax, because of the fact that they do not report their intangible property; and so far as the District of Columbia is concerned, and so far as the people of the United States are concerned, it is conservatively estimated that the substitution of this income tax law for the present intangible property tax law of the District will increase the revenues of the District of Columbia at least $750,000 per annum.

This, briefly, explains the bill. We are all more or less familiar with just what an income tax is, and the provisions are all the same in principle.

Now, just a word with respect to some matters that have been advanced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] with respect to the liberality which has heretofore been shown the District of Columbia. There is no question about that in my mind and, I think, in the minds of the members of the committee.

Some Members of the House seem to be of the opinion that, perhaps even with the enactment of the legislation we propose and the contribution that we suggest, we, representing both the District of Columbia and the people of the United States, are perhaps still too liberal.

In the first place, I call attention to the fact that the enactment of the measures we propose does not in any sense of the word preclude enactment of any additional measure. Any Member of the House is at full liberty to examine the report of the committee, the large mass of facts and data which are furnished in the report and appendices, and such other information which he may obtain, and prepare such additional bill as he may prefer with reference to a real property tax, or anything else, and present it for the consideration of the Congress.

Personally, the members of the committee feel that a great deal will have been accomplished, and a great deal of progress made if we enact the bills which members of the committee have introduced, and adopt the contribution not to exceed $6,500,000 suggested by the committee.

In that connection I want to state that, in the final analysis, whatever contribution shall be appropriated from the Treasury of the Federal Government for the support of the District of Columbia must be reported by the Committee on Appropriations, enacted by both the House and the Senate, and, of course, signed by the President of the United States.

Upon the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations which will handle the District of Columbia appropriation bill are such men as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY], and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], who is chairman of the subcommittee. There are no men in the House more familiar with the history of the affairs of the District of Columbia and the relation between the District of Columbia and the Federal Government than those gentlemen. These gentlemen have for years been studying these problems, and they may be relied upon to handle the situation intelligently and patriotically. If, in their own good judgment, they think $6,500,000 is too much, it is within their power and is their privilege to fix such other amount as they see proper.

In our report we feel that, under the direction given us by Congress, it was not proper to deal with the situation as it existed only for one year, but we undertook to deal with the situation generally for a number of years in order that there might be some stabilization of these relations and in order that we might not have a continual controversy in Congress year after year as to the size of the contribution, particularly between the two branches of Congress. We devoutly hope that the laborious efforts of the committee, with their report and the bills introduced, may to some extent, at least, solve that very troublesome and important question. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee has explained the provisions of the bill before the committee in a way that makes it unnecessary to explain them much further than he has already done.

I take it from my reading of the local papers during the last few days that there is some criticism of the action of the committee as to the recommendation of the committee of the contribution to be made by the Federal Government to the expenses of the District, but I have not heard any serious criticism of the bills which were reported by the committee.

The truth is that the home owners in the District of Columbia ought to welcome this income tax bill now before the committee. If people do not have an income, they do not have to pay an income tax, but the home owner who owns a house and lot has to pay the general property tax whether he has the money to pay it with or not, or whether he has any income or not. If he can not pay it, he loses his home. One of the purposes of the committee in reporting this bill is to relieve to some extent the general property tax. The committee believes in the principles of an income tax. It believes that it is one of the fairest and most equitable taxes that can be levied and it believes that it should be adopted for the District of Columbia.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. My understanding of the discussion yesterday under general debate is to the effect that the committee expects to raise about four and a half million dollars of additional revenue by the proposed changes.

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. Then, I also recall that a recommendation was made that the lump sum we appropriate every year should be reduced from $9,500,000 to $6,500,000. That is a reduction of $3,000,000. Taking that from the four and a half million dollars of increased taxes, we have one million and a half dollars which is to be taken off the levy now made against the real estate in the District of Columbia. That means that the homes of which the gentleman has just spoken will be relieved to the extent of that amount, if the present set-up remains the same, and that people who have not been paying taxes on other classes of property will make that contribution.

Mr. MAPES. What my colleague says is true, with this exception, that the law now provides that the tax rate on real estate and tangible personal property shall be not less than $1.70 per hundred. That is as high as it has been during the last few years. Unless that law is changed that rate will continue, or will not be lower, but the passage of this bill and the others reported by the committee will help to keep the rate down as the cost of government increases.

Mr. KETCHAM. Then my colleague's idea is that the passage of this bill as it is establishes the principle that if additional taxes are to be paid they are to come out of other sources rather than increasing the tax rate on homes.

Mr. MAPES. That is correct.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I received in the mail this morning a printed report from the committee of which the gentleman has the honor to be the chairman, entitled "Fiscal Relations in the District of Columbia," and it is labeled Report No. 1. I have had no opportunity to go through this report. I am anxious to know how many other reports will follow this.

Mr. MAPES. As was explained on the floor yesterday, the main report of the committee requires no action by the House.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Is this to be the main report?

Mr. MAPES. Report No. 1.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Reducing the contribution of the Government from $9,500,000 to $6,500,000?

Mr. MAPES. That is correct.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is the main report?

Mr. MAPES. In addition to that report the committee reported four bills, and accompanied each bill with a separate report. The first bill called up by the committee is the bill calling for an income tax within the District of Columbia, and a separate report accompanies that bill.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is the bill now under consideration?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Does the gentleman contemplate that the bill will be brought to a vote to-day?

Mr. MAPES. That is the hope of the committee.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Is there any argument or any report in favor of this income tax indicating the reasons for the income tax?

Mr. MAPES. Yes. I shall call the gentleman's attention to some in a moment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Is that printed?

Mr. MAPES. The hearings are printed. I have just said that each one of these bills is accompanied by a separate report.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I see a report here entitled "Report No. 2," consisting of a page and a half. It simply expresses the opinion of the committee without giving any argument or advancing any reasons in favor of the bill?

Mr. MAPES. Of course, the gentleman can reach that conclusion if he chooses to do so. There is no argument that would convince some people and make them favor an income tax. The committee accepts that condition or attitude of mine, but it does not agree with it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. MAPES. I have only a few minutes' time. I ask the gentleman to make his question brief.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Oh, the gentleman can get loads of time.

Mr. MAPES. My time has almost expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The bill providing for an income tax is supported by this report which I have mentioned, No. 2. Would it not be well to have a decision reached by the House on the main proposition, the reduction of the lump sum, before we pass on this question of an income tax?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, as far as the committee is concerned, it will be glad to have an expression of the House on the main proposition, as the gentleman has called it; that is, on the report which the committee has made with reference to the contribution of the Federal Government to the expenses of the District government; but regardless of that, whatever the attitude of the House may be on the main report, the committee feels that an income tax law should be enacted for the District of Columbia in place of the present intangible personal-property tax, and I am sure the gentleman from New York can express his convictions and his thoughts upon this particular piece of legislation without any reference to the main report of the committee.

The committee thinks that the income tax should be substituted for the present intangible personal-property tax, and that it is the most equitable, the fairest, and altogether the simplest tax, as far as intangible personal property is concerned, that can be levied. The committee expressed its judgment about the desirability of such a tax by reporting this bill.

The committee feels that it is as important perhaps to adopt the policy of the income tax in the District of Columbia as it is to adopt any particular feature of the bill. For that reason it has been particularly temperate in the rates which have been suggested in the bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

Mr. MAPES. The House and the District should keep in mind that this bill not only establishes an income tax, but it repeals the present intangible personal-property tax. In the different States criticism is sometimes made of a proposed income tax law that it simply raises so much more revenue without relieving the tax burden at some other point and is to that extent an invitation to the authorities to increase their budget. This bill can not be subjected to this criticism, because it repeals the present intangible personal-property tax. Notwithstanding the low rates in the bill, it is estimated by the District assessor's office and by the tax expert of the committee, that it will raise in revenue something between $750,000 and $1,000,000 more than is now raised from the intangible personal property tax.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] asked if there was anyone appearing before the committee who suggested a tax of this kind for the District. I call his attention to the statement of Mr. Thomas Walker Page, at present a member of the United States Tariff Commission, and as he says, for 30 years a professor of taxation in different universities, such as the University of Chicago, the University of California, the University of Texas, the University of Virginia, and others. Mr. Page says on page 261 of the hearings:

> My suggestion of an income tax is based upon the experience that several States have had with it as a substitute for the tax on intangible property. Your own State—> was the leader in that movement. The State of Wisconsin was the first State that substituted the income tax for the tax on intangible property. Other States have followed. Some have substituted it completely for the tax on intangible property; others only partially; and some States have both an income tax and a tax on intangible property, and that is quite obviously unfair.

Addressing himself to Mr. FREAR, of Wisconsin—

>
> Mr. FREAR. It results in double taxation?
> Mr. PAGE. Yes. My belief has been for many years that of all our taxes, that on intangible property works more injustice than any other. It is too easy to conceal intangible property, so easy that most people evade it.

It is in pursuance of the best thought on taxation, as the committee thinks, that it reports this bill.

On page 265 of the hearings Mr. Page said:

> There was one capitalist of national fame, one of our greatest men, who was a citizen of one of the adjoining States—I will not mention his name—who, when his estate was assessed for income-tax purposes, moved his residence at least nominally to the District of Columbia.

Now, as the committee says in its main report, this tax is paid in different States, and unless the District of Columbia has a similar tax, the tendency is bound to be on the part of those who do not want to pay an income tax, who want to dodge such a tax, to move to the District of Columbia. It is to prevent that and to relieve the general property tax that the committee reports this particular bill.

Mr. Chairman, if there is no further debate on the bill, I ask that the Clerk read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.—

DEFINITIONS

SECTION 1. The following terms in this act are for the purpose hereof defined as follows:

(a) The term "person" shall mean and include every individual, trust or estate, corporation, joint-stock company, partnership, or association organized for profit, unless otherwise expressly stated.

(b) The term "fiduciary" shall mean a guardian, trustee, executor, administrator, receiver, conservator, or any person, whether individual or corporate, acting in any fiduciary capacity for any person, trust, or estate.

(c) The term "District" shall mean the District of Columbia.

(d) The term "dividend" shall mean any distribution made by a corporation out of its earnings or profits to its shareholders, whether in cash or in other property, or in stock of the corporation other than stock dividends, as herein defined.

(e) The term "stock dividends" shall mean new stock issued for surplus or profits, capitalized to shareholders in proportion to their previous holdings.

(f) The term "gross income," wherever it appears in this act, shall mean and include gains, profits, and income derived from business of whatever kind and in whatever form paid, including gains or profits or income derived through estates or trusts by the beneficiaries thereof, either as distributed or as distributable shares; gains, profits, or income from dealings in real or personal property; gains, profits, or income received as compensation for services, as interest, rents, commissions, brokerage, or other fees, or otherwise received in carrying on any business, profession, or occupation; all interest received from Federal, State, municipal, or other bonds and all dividends received on stocks: Provided, That if the gross income is derived from the transaction of business in part within and part without the District of Columbia, gross income shall mean that portion of the income derived from business transacted within the District of Columbia, to be ascertained and allocated in such manner as will fairly determine the gross income of business transacted within the District. The assessor of the District shall have power to prescribe such rules and regulations as will properly carry out the direction and detail of this provision.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the select committee, appointed to study fiscal relations with the District of Columbia, has devoted a great deal of time and study to this very important question, but it seems to me we are putting the cart before the horse. I feel it would have been more constructive had we appointed a committee to study and submit plans for the reorganization of the municipal government of the city of Washington. The present arrangement is cumbersome, unwieldy, and unsatisfactory. Congress can not, in the very nature of things, devote the time and attention which the details of a municipal government require. Just think of it. The paving and repaving of streets, the opening of streets, lamp-posts, pushcart peddlers, and many, many petty details that a municipal government must attend to, come before the House of Representatives and the Senate, with no one particularly interested in the subject matter.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield right on that point?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The distinguished gentleman from New York, among the many valuable fights he has made here, made one of extreme value to the people when he stopped the city administration and commissioners from running a street through the Walter Reed Hospital grounds.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I remember that fight.

Mr. BLANTON. Suppose we had had the kind of legislation which the gentleman now wants, giving them all the power and not having to come to Congress, they would have opened a public street through the Walter Reed Hospital grounds to the detriment of every single soldier there.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman rendered signal service in stopping it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They could not have done that, because in order to run a street through Government property they necessarily would have had to obtain the consent of Congress, and we would have stopped it.

The present government of the District of Columbia is unsatisfactory.

Now, there are some gentlemen who have devoted a great deal of time and effort to the management of the District.

When the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] was on the District Committee, he devoted all of his time and his energies, to the detriment of his health, to an active and intelligent interest in the affairs of the District of Columbia. For that he was abused and ridiculed, and word was sent to his district that he was devoting all of his time to those matters. That is the fate of every Member who goes on that committee and assumes responsibilities as a member of the District Committee. It is simply impossible to resolve this body into a board of aldermen to properly attend to District matters.

I believe the city of Washington ought to be a model city in every way. It ought to have the best schools of the country, the best police and fire departments, the best street-cleaning department, an up-to-date health department, and proper supervision of housing. It ought to be the model municipal government of the whole country. Therefore I believe we should give the matter of the government of the District of Columbia some study. I believe we should provide a managerial form of government, with proper control and supervision by Congress, but limiting the powers of Congress to the supervisory end of it, instead of trying to do the work of a board of aldermen.

We boast of the building program that is now going on in the city of Washington. Without doubt the city of Washington will be the most beautiful city in the world within five years, when that building program is completed. But, gentlemen, within a few blocks of these monumental Government buildings we still have people living in hovels and in such insanitary homes and under such conditions as would shame any first-class city.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYLAN. As a matter of fact, they are really dumps.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. As my colleague from New York [Mr. BOYLAN] points out, they are dumps, and I believe on several previous occasions he has called the attention of the House to them. Think of spending hundreds of millions of dollars in a great building program and neglecting housing. The housing of the District of Columbia has been absolutely neglected. We should provide in the Capital City model apartment houses and model homes. Oh, some one will say: What are you suggesting—that the city go into the housing proposition? Yes; if necessary. I am not afraid to suggest it if that is necessary in order to give all the inhabitants of the District of Columbia sanitary and cheerful American homes. The greedy landlords of the city will not do that, so the District should put up model apartments and houses for wage earners of moderate means.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. Would it not be well to set some kind of an example like that and see about the outrageous rents which are charged here?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am coming to that. A great deal has been said about lifting the burden of taxation on real estate and, of course, the home is always brought up. Well, I am for that. I would like to lift from the home owner all the burden possible, but we have in Washington the greediest lot of profiteering landlords than there are in any city of the country. I have no sympathy for them. They will take care of themselves, as they always do. We should provide a municipal government, and municipal housing should be one of its important functions.

I submit that some reorganization of the District government ought to be brought about in order to relieve the Congress of the details of a board of aldermen. A city manager should be provided; the people of the District should have a voice in the election of the commissioners; the Government should be properly represented in the commission-managerial form of city government. The budget should be submitted to the Congress for approval and determination as to its contribution which comes out of the Federal Treasury. The conditions of the city of Washington and the tax-rate conditions here are not comparable to any other city in the country. We have no industries here, and properly so. We have more space taken up by public buildings than is usual in any other American city. We have more boulevards and avenues and parks, necessary to provide proper landscaping for our monumental public buildings. Therefore we can not compare conditions in the city of Washington with those of any industrial or commercial city in the country.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. Does not the gentleman think that under the efficient chairmanship of the distinguished lady from New Jersey the District Committee is liable to be rejuvenated?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. And perhaps we will have better and more beneficial results than we have had heretofore.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentlewoman from New Jersey is well qualified. She will no doubt take up her tasks as chairman of the District Committee full of ideas and ideals, and she will no doubt bring to the attention of the House the social legislation necessary for the protection of the people of the District. I fear that she, too, will be blocked on every side, and perhaps unjustly abused as many others who endeavored to be of real service to the District.

Mr. BOYLAN. We will not permit it, will we?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We will not. The lady from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON] is a very useful legislator and well able to assume the difficult task of chairman of the District Committee.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. In advocating that the Government build homes for the people of Washington—

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certain types of homes.

Mr. BLANTON. And renting them to the people of Washington, is the gentleman speaking the policy of the Hoover-Mills-Mellon-Snell Republican administration?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am speaking the policy of progressive, up-to-date city government.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman spoke of no industries here. The gentleman forgets that there is a Government pay roll here for nearly 100,000 people under which money is paid to them every two weeks, new money that has never been spent before. The people on that pay roll enjoy the greatest benefits of any people in the world, because they get their money regularly. There are no bank failures and there is no depression in the District.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. With a Government pay roll for nearly 100,000 people you do not need industries.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course not. I am not advocating industries here. I would even make the zoning laws stricter in order to prevent any encroachment on the residential districts. I would not have any industries here at all.

As to the 100,000 employees and what they get, I for one will take the stand that they earn every cent they get, and let the word go out right now that there is going to be the greatest and bitterest fight that ever happened on the floor of this House if any attempt is made to reduce the salaries of Government employees. [Applause.] I think the United States Government ought to set an example as to what is a fair, American wage to permit working men and women to live up to the American standard. But let us not get off the subject now. We will take care of that fight when it comes.

I do believe, however, after you are through establishing your fiscal arrangements, after you have fixed the taxes, we should get right down to the fundamentals of what is in the best interest of the people living here in the District and of the country in general, and should appoint a committee to study any necessary reorganization of the municipal government of the city of Washington.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will permit, on the question of reducing salaries, the only proposal that has thus far been made in this Congress has come from the gentleman's Republican side and in a Republican bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Good. Now, will the gentleman from Texas stand by me in opposing salary reduction?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes, I will; on every legitimate salary now drawn by an honest employee of the Government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Fine; shake on that. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I have not had time to study all the provisions of this bill, but I have read some of the first sections, and as I was reading the first section the query mounted in my mind as to whether the committee has described the word "person" with sufficient definiteness. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the special committee whether the word "person" includes Members of Congress. I may call the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that the word "person" as described in this first section does not say those domiciled or residing in the District of Columbia, but simply says that the term "person" shall mean and include every individual, trust or estate, corporation, and so forth. I think the bill is wanting in definiteness in not singling out just what the word "person" includes. Perhaps it is the intention of the committee reporting this bill that Members of Congress shall be subject to its provisions with respect to the payment of income taxes. Certainly, as the bill is drawn, with this vague definition of the word "person," I think it could with consistency be claimed that Members of Congress are subject to the payment of the income tax. Is it the purpose of the gentleman's committee to include Members of Congress in the payment of the income tax as provided in this bill?

Mr. MAPES. If any of them live in the District of Columbia; but, of course, none of them do.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do we not all live in the District of Columbia during the sessions of Congress?

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will permit, certainly it would not apply to a Member of Congress, because he lives in his home district and is taxed in his own State.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am serious in my presentation of this question.

Mr. MAPES. I will answer the gentleman's question. Section 10, on page 12, says that a tax is "hereby imposed upon every person as herein defined resident of the District of Columbia."

Mr. STAFFORD. I must confess that I had not read that far in the bill. I was trying to scan some descriptive definition of the word "person."

Mr. MAPES. As the gentleman knows, you can not put all of a bill in the first section.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is true; but the bill defines in the first section what a "person" is. I thought that was the proper place to look for a delimitation of the description of "person."

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And we Members of the Congress who have to stay here to attend to our business, whether we stay in a rented house or in an owned house, are not residents of the District of Columbia; we are residents of our respective districts in our own States.

Mr. STAFFORD. The chairman of the special committee has called attention to the fact that it is limited to residents of the District. My attention had not previously been called to that section.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEDUCTIONS FROM INCOME OF INDIVIDUALS

SEC. 2. The term "net income," as herein used, shall mean the gross income less the following deductions:

(a) All interest paid during the taxable year on indebtedness: Provided, That no interest shall be allowed as a deduction if paid on an indebtedness created for the purchase, maintenance, or improvement of property, or for the conduct of a business, unless the income from such property or business would be taxable under the provisions of this act.

(b) Taxes paid during the taxable year (except inheritance taxes, taxes paid under the provisions of this act, and taxes on income and profits imposed by authority of the United States): Provided, That special taxes imposed for betterments, and which betterments tend to increase the value of the abutting property, shall not be deducted.

(c) All the ordinary and necessary expenses paid or incurred during the taxable year in carrying on business, or a profession or occupation, including a reasonable allowance for salaries or personal service actually rendered; also rentals or other payments required to be made as a condition to the continued use or possession for business purposes of property to which the taxpayer has not taken or is not taking title, or in which the taxpayer has no equity: Provided, That the provisions of this subdivision shall not be construed to include payment as a premium to an occupant to vacate such property for the benefit of the person or firm wishing possession of such premises.

(d) Losses sustained during the taxable year and not compensated for by insurance or otherwise: Provided, That no loss resulting from the operation of business conducted without the District may be allowed as a deduction unless the income derived from the operation of business without the District is subject to taxation: And provided further, That no loss may be allowed on the sale of property purchased and held for pleasure or recreation and which was not acquired or used for profit, but this proviso shall not be construed to exclude losses due to theft or to the destruction of property by fire, flood, or other casualty.

(e) All worthless debts charged off within the taxable year.

(f) A reasonable allowance for the exhaustion, wear and tear, and obsolescence of property used in the transaction of business may be deducted from gross income, provided such depreciation is actually charged off.

(g) Contributions or gifts made within the year to corporations or associations operating within the District of Columbia and organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, benevolent, or educational purposes; or to societies conducted exclusively for the prevention of cruelty to children or animals, no part of the net income of which inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual. The assessor of the District shall prescribe such rules and regulations for the carrying out of the provisions of this subdivision as he may determine are necessary in order to prevent any abuse of this exemption privilege.

(h) Dividends or incomes received by any persons from stocks or interest in any corporation, joint-stock company, or association, the income of which shall have been assessed under the provisions of this act: Provided, That when only part of the income of any corporation, joint-stock company, or association shall have been assessed under this act only a corresponding part of the dividends or income received therefrom shall be deducted.

(i) Dividends received on shares of corporations doing business in the District of Columbia and which corporations are required by law to pay a tax on their gross earnings or gross receipts.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee wherein the provision under subtitle (i) differs from the provision under subtitle (h). Under subtitle (h) there are exempted dividends or incomes received by any person through stocks or interest in any corporation, and so forth, and then in subtitle (i) you, seemingly, provide for the same character of dividends. Will the chairman of the committee explain the reasons for the need of subtitle (i)?

Mr. MAPES. It seems to me that one applies to the companies that are assessed on their incomes under this bill, and the other applies to companies that are assessed under the present law which assesses them on their gross receipts and gross incomes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Though the phraseology is slightly different, still it pertains to the same subject matter, as I read it.

Mr. MAPES. I think if the gentleman reads it closely, he will find that section (h) relates to corporations which are required under this act to pay the income tax, and subdivision (i) relates to those corporations that are assessed under existing law on their gross receipts and gross incomes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Subdivision (h) refers to dividends received by individuals and is a customary provision in income-tax legislation, that there shall not be double taxation; that if a person receives a dividend from a corporation, as the gentleman well knows, he shall be exempted from including that dividend in the reporting of his gross income.

Mr. MAPES. But subdivision (h) says that the individual who receives dividends from a corporation that has had to pay an income tax shall not be required to pay further income tax on those dividends. Subdivision (i) says that that same rule shall apply to those that receive dividends from corporations that are assessed on their gross receipts or gross incomes.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I inquire further, if the gentleman has not previously stated to the House, whether the committee followed any income tax law of any State as its model?

Mr. MAPES. The committee endeavored to make a model income tax law, taking the best provisions of different States.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the committee did not adopt the provisions of any one State, but used the statutes of some States as a working basis?

Mr. MAPES. No; the committee did not adopt the provisions of any State in toto.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, it took me several years to find out the unwisdom of the suggestion made by our friend from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] that Congress should release its control of this District and turn it over to local authorities in Washington. The few miles square that constitute the District of Columbia are specially set aside by the United States Government for the transaction of its business. It is not constituted for the benefit of the hotels of Washington. They are put up for the private profit and benefit of business combinations which coin money out of our people by reason of the Government's plant in Washington. The District of Columbia is not here for the benefit of the newspaper publishers, Ed McLean, William Randolph Hearst, or Theodore Noyes. Those newspapers are merely incidents; they have come here to make money off the Government plant by selling their papers to the people who live here, and so of all the business organizations of the city of Washington. They do not have to live in Washington if they do not like it. If they do not like the way Congress runs Washington—these few miles square set aside for the Government business—they can move out.

If the city of Chicago will pay $150,000 for the Republican convention, how much do you suppose Chicago would pay for this Federal Government? How many million dollars? How many million dollars would Philadelphia pay if the Capital were moved there? These people are here to make money off the Government plant and the Government employees, and those who live here should consider themselves especially fortunate.

Their property has grown from lots worth $100 to lots now worth $500,000, some of them, and every time the Government wants to buy a piece of property for its own use it is charged four times as much as they would have asked for it before the Government needed it.

I say to my friend from New York that when I first came here I could not see any necessity for a separate park police; I could see no necessity for a separate police force for the Capitol; I could see no need for a separate police for the Senate and the House Office Building, or for a separate police for the White House, or for a separate police for the Agricultural Department. I could not see any sense in it. I sought for five years to consolidate them all within the Metropolitan police force.

Then I waked up, and I found I was all wrong. I realized that there is a necessity for it. It is for the interest of the Government and the people of the United States that we keep absolute control of the District of Columbia, that we keep control of its streets, that we keep control of the Government plant here, in spite of the criticism of these newspapers. They are not running the Government.

Mr. Hearst invited me to go on his Canadian junket. I appreciated his invitation, but I wired Mr. Hearst that while I thanked him, I preferred to be wholly untrammeled in passing upon the proposition he had under way—the sales tax.

Do you know that there has been an attempt by the big financial interests for years to put on the shoulders of the poor people an added burden of a sales tax?

Here is one Member of Congress that is not going to be hog-tied on that proposition. They are not going to saddle onto the backs of the poor people of this country by my vote the burden of a sales tax. While I appreciated the invitation of our splendid entertainer in New York, Mr. Hearst, to go on his junket, where they had a good time and plenty to eat, and other good things [laughter], I respectfully declined.

Now, I want to say of my friend from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], that he is a very valuable man, and always has been. He saved Muscle Shoals for the people of the United States. When there was a proposition to turn it over 10 years ago, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] stood here and led the fight to hold it for the people of this country. But I want to say that when he advocates taking away the Government control of property and all business here in Washington, it is not for the best interest of the United States Government. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. For the purpose of ascertaining the gain derived or loss sustained from the sale or other disposition of property, real, personal, or mixed, acquired on or after January 1, 1931, the basis shall be the cost thereof and, in case of property acquired prior to that date and disposed of thereafter, the basis shall be the fair market value thereof as of said date.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask a question about another section. On page 7, line 16, subsection (e), there is a reference to contributions or gifts made within the year to corporations or associations "operating within the District."

Assume, for instance, that in a year like last year when public contributions were solicited for the Red Cross to take care of the drought situation in other States; collections are made and received here by the Red Cross for such a general purpose. Under the language of this paragraph I am wondering whether contributions so made could be deducted. As I construe it, simply as a curbstone proposition, it would appear not.

Am I right, or is it to be construed otherwise? What do the words "operating within the District" mean? Operating is a general term. At first I thought it meant any corporation with its headquarters or principal place of business in the District. I assume that such can not be so, because more exact language would have been used in that case. There are many charitable organizations of various kinds that operate all over the United States, but because of the situation which exists here in the National Capital, economic and otherwise, they do not operate within the District under the general meaning of that term. There are certain organizations whose work of necessity takes them into rural communities—public-health work of various kinds—that might not operate at all within the District.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, this is a provision which is usual in the State income tax laws. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] suggests that if we attempt to go any further than that we would find ourselves without jurisdiction. We have no jurisdiction outside of the District. Further, this is a very liberal provision as it stands. As the gentleman knows, the Federal law gives exemption only for a limited amount.

Mr. BURTNESS. Fifteen per cent, if I remember correctly.

Mr. MAPES. So that the committee thought on the whole this was a very liberal provision.

Mr. BURTNESS. I agree that the provision seems liberal in a general way, but what I am asking is the committee's construction of the words. Of course, on the question of jurisdiction which the gentleman from Wisconsin raises, that is a question that is not involved at all. All you are doing here is to provide for an exemption from taxation of a certain amount contributed by a corporation doing business within the District of Columbia. I take it that you have a legal right to exempt any contribution, if you so desire, made for charitable purposes, wherever it may be made. You are not in any way attempting to control the business of the corporation in that regard, but may extend or limit exemptions in your discretion, as far as your legal right to do so is concerned.

Mr. MAPES. My construction of the language would make it include the Red Cross. As you say, that is operating within the District.

Mr. BURTNESS. Would it include contributions made to the National Red Cross for national work, or would it include only contributions that may be made to the local Red Cross Association for local work within the District?

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman's guess is as good as mine. My own guess is that it would include the Red Cross generally.

Mr. BURTNESS. It would include contributions made to the National Red Cross?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXEMPTIONS

SEC. 9. The following items shall be exempt from taxation under this act:

(a) The income of a single person, or a married person not living with husband or wife, up to but not in excess of $1,000.

(b) The income of a married person living with husband or wife up to but not in excess of $2,500: Provided, That if a husband and wife make separate returns or have separate incomes the exemption for each shall be $1,000.

(c) Three hundred dollars for each dependent child under 18 years of age, and for each additional person who is actually supported by and entirely dependent upon the taxpayer for his support.

(d) Dividends received from national banks and mutual savings banks.

(e) Pensions received from the United States.

(f) All inheritances, devises, bequests, and gifts received during the year.

(g) All insurance received by any person in payment of a death claim by any insurance company, fraternal-benefit society, or other insurer, except insurance paid to a corporation or to a partnership upon policies on the lives of its officers, partners, or employees: Provided, That interest on premiums paid to the insured or accumulated for him before the maturity of any insurance policy shall not be exempt from taxation.

(h) Income of national banks, mutual savings banks, trust companies, building and loan associations, and of all religious, scientific, benevolent, or educational organizations not organized or conducted for pecuniary profit.

(i) Interest upon the obligations of the United States or its possessions; or interest upon the obligations of any State government or of any political subdivision thereof.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word to direct the attention of the committee in charge of the legislation to paragraph (b) of this section 9.

Paragraph (a) provides that the exemption for a single person shall be $1,000. Paragraph (b) provides that the exemption of a married person living with the husband or wife shall be $2,500. Then there is a provision that if the husband and the wife make separate returns or have separate incomes, the exemption for each shall be $1,000. I never did think there is exact justice in our Federal law which does not permit a single man or a single woman an exemption amounting to as much as 50 per cent of that granted a married person, but I shall leave it to the bachelors of the House to argue that feature of it. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] says that he will take care of that.

I can not now see why if a wife has had a little legacy left her by some member of her family, and may have an income of $100 a year from it and would therefore be obligated to file a return, the family as such in that case should have the exemption cut down $500. If I construe the language correctly, that is what it amounts to. It would create an incentive possibly for fraud and deception, or at least for failure to file returns. There does not seem to be a provision authorizing one member of the family to file a return for himself and spouse. Such is the case under the Federal law, and the exemption can be claimed in the general way. What, therefore, is the reason for this deduction of the exemption for husband and wife jointly under this law if they have to file separate returns? Why are they not at least entitled to an amendment which would make the exemption for each $1,250 instead of $1,000, so that between the two of them they would have the same exemption as that granted the husband if he alone files the return.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume that the committee determined that for a single person $1,000 should be the maximum amount of the exemption, and the next provision that the maximum exemption for a family should be $2,500. The following provision, I take it, is where perhaps a man and a wife make a living separately, and if they are living separately, without the responsibility of a home, maybe the committee thought they should be placed on the same plane as a single person.

Mr. BURTNESS. But the bill does not say so. It does not refer to the husband and wife living separately but is general in application.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no.

Mr. BURTNESS. There are many husbands and wives who have separate incomes. In many cases the income of the wife may be only a nominal income, and yet I assume she would have to file a return.

Mr. STAFFORD. Assuming the wife has a separate income and the husband has a separate income and they are living together and have children, the man would be entitled not only to the $1,000 exemption but he would also be entitled to the exemption that is accorded for children up to 18 years of age. Not so with the wife. The husband would be getting the exemption that properly falls to a married man as far as having children is concerned. He would get his $1,000 exemption and also $300 exemption for each child under 18 years of age. This is predicated upon the idea that both the man and the woman have large separate incomes of their own. If they have large separate incomes of their own, why should the wife be entitled to any greater exemption than a single person who is not maintaining a family?

Mr. BURTNESS. I do not think she should be entitled to any exemption under those circumstances, but I do think that the husband should be entitled to deduct his exemption of $2,500 as a married man, and thus do away with the discrepancy that is plainly involved in this bill under the terms thereof.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman referred to me in connection with the question of celibacy. I think if a gentleman was living with a woman with a separate income he would find some trouble in the family if she was not granted a deduction.

Mr. BURTNESS. None of them is granted a deduction under the Federal law unless the husband fails to claim it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

While the income tax is being discussed and the matter of exemption being considered, I notice in the last paragraph of the bill in respect to the tax on intangible property, the words that "for the period between July 1, 1932, and July 1, 1933, it shall be credited to the income tax payable in 1933." Although I have not noticed it in the bill, yet I presume it is there, that intangible property is not hereafter to be subjected to a millage tax. It has been so written in most of the State income tax laws, and the assessors of municipalities, after an income tax is imposed, can not further reach intangible property. Thereafter those people who have hidden their intangibles during all these years, and who have been unwilling to subject themselves to a millage tax of perhaps $17.50 per $1,000, can draw a long breath now and say, "We can now be honest. We can now tell what we have, and have such a light income-tax rate that we will pay less than we would have had to pay before."

This is an unconditional surrender to owners of intangibles, as it usually is in all of the States. My own State has an income tax of 6 per cent, but the assessors can not impose a further tax on intangible personal property in any municipality. So that the burden is imposed on those who own real estate, the homes of people who have to pay twenty-five or thirty dollars per thousand on that class of wealth. For instance, if they have a thousand dollars of intangible property, a bond that pays 6 per cent or yields $60 a year, they pay 6 per cent on that $60. Therefore they pay $3.60 a year on that bond, which may be easily sold. They pay on that $3.60 as against the home owner who pays twenty-five or thirty dollars per thousand.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. The estimates are that the receipts from the income tax will be more than the receipts from the intangible personal property tax.

Mr. GIFFORD. I read that; but I would say that in my State we estimated that $5,000,000,000 was in hiding, and it was, but when our tax was imposed we got about the same amount from the income tax as we got from the old tax on intangibles. Is it any victory that you may after all these years get that class of people to acknowledge that they have had these intangibles for years and years? Is it any answer to say that you get a little more revenue by this form of tax and grant this difference to these two classes of wealth?

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. If under your intangible-tax system you were unable to find all of this amount that was in hiding, certainly it would be more equitable to have the tax applied to the income of all alike than it is to let some evade the millage or intangible tax.

Mr. GIFFORD. I have heard that argument many times before. We yield to the practical conditions. Rhode Island and Connecticut impose, as I understand it, a tax of 3 or 4 mills, or perhaps $4 per thousand, but they do not dare demand that their citizens make a return, because if they were forced to they would move to New York, where the rate is only 1 per cent on the first ten thousand, 2 per cent on the second ten thousand, and only 3 per cent on incomes of $50,000 or more, and the intangibles bear no other State or municipal taxes. Therefore, the race to attract money from one State to another is so great that our adjoining States do not dare tax property as they should.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GIFFORD. My idea in proceeding a little longer is to quote you, when we come to these rates of 1 per cent and 2 per cent and as high as 5 per cent, that New Hampshire, on account of the situation regarding Massachusetts and the other States, imposes a very light income tax. It would make it amount to perhaps $1 per thousand on this class of wealth, as against $25 or $30 per $1,000.

I can remember not long ago the very best citizens of our communities being approached by outside salesmen who would say, "You may well buy these intangibles; your assessors will never know you have them," although they knew it was their duty to pay a tax on their intangibles like other people for the support of their institutions. They would invest money in those intangibles and would escape the tax.

What I want to impress upon you in these few remarks is this: To-day you are untaxing the intangible wealth of the District of Columbia. You are saying you are going to make men honest, but only honest because they have such a low rate, the rate being so low that you will hardly get any increase even in the returns that may be made. I want to remind you that has been the situation in all the States. Illinois, I think, sticks to the millage tax. They have not been willing to come to an income tax. I do not know why; but I remember that one of their citizens came into one of my towns one day and said, "They are dooming me too much; they are guessing at me too much; I will bring $16,000,000 into your State if you will not ask me for any more." And they cut the tax rate more than one-half by that one action, so that people were moving these intangibles from place to place. But sometime the home owners are going to wake up. They are going to understand this plan and they are going to say, "How long, how long will intangibles, bonds and stocks, and things of that kind, which can readily be sold on the market, be taxed only when they pay a dividend, and then at a rate of only $2 or $3 a thousand, when the home owner is compelled to pay 25 per cent or 40 per cent on his home?"

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer some amendments to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BOYLAN: On page 10, in line 19, after the word "of," strike out the sign and figures "$1,000" and insert in lieu thereof the sign and figures "$1,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have all of the amendments read, because they pertain to this same section.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments will have to be considered separately.

Mr. BOYLAN. I have offered four amendments. They all pertain to this same section, and I think if they were all read, I would be willing to discuss the four at one time, in order to save the time of the committee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that they be read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the amendments he proposes to offer be considered en bloc. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 10, line 19, after the word "of," strike out the sign and figures "$1,000" and insert in lieu thereof the sign and figures "$1,500."

On page 10, line 21, after the word "of," strike out the sign and figures "$2,500" and insert in lieu thereof the sign and figures "$3,500."

In line 24, page 10, strike out "$1,000" and insert "$1,500."

On page 11, in line 1, strike out the words "three hundred" and insert in lieu thereof the words "five hundred."

On page 11, line 24, insert a new section, subsection (j): "All moneys expended for medical and hospital services."

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, the first amendment, on page 10, increases the exemption from $1,000 to $1,500. This is in conformity with the Federal income tax law and in those States having an income tax the Federal rates are usually followed. The second amendment, on page 10, line 21, increases the exemption for married persons to $3,500, which is also in conformity with the Federal law. The amendment on page 10, line 24, creates an exemption of $1,500 each for a husband and wife making a separate return. That has already been gone into by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURTNESS]. I think that married persons should at least have the same exemption as single persons. The amendment on page 11, line 1, provides an exemption for each dependent child of $500 instead of $300. All of us who pay an income tax know that the idea of trying to say you can support a child on $300 a year is a myth. So I have made that exemption $500. The new section, following line 24, on page 11, subsection (j), provides an exemption for all moneys paid for medical and hospital services during the year.

I think every one of these amendments is a fair amendment. Why should we mulct the people of the District of Columbia? The exemption made in the Federal tax law is $1,500 for a single person, so why should we only allow $1,000 in this bill? If the exemption for the head of a family is $3,500 under the Federal act, why should we only allow $2,500?

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman's State of New York is one of the States that has an income tax law. I would like to ask the gentleman what the exemption is in his State law.

Mr. BOYLAN. In New York State we follow the Federal exemption, as I stated in my remarks.

Mr. MAPES. Is there provision made in the New York law for the exemption of medical and hospital services?

Mr. BOYLAN. There is not; but I am going to introduce an amendment to the Federal revenue act to include it, because I think it is very unfair to the taxpayer that it is not included.

I have had experience in the last year or two with personal friends of mine where as much as eight-tenths of their entire income during one year was paid for hospital and medical expenses and not one dollar of that was permitted to be exempt under the law.

I think if we are going to tax the people of the District we ought not to go any farther, at least, than the Federal law goes. I think these amendments are fair.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. Certainly.

Mr. FREAR. The question occurs to me, if you offer this amendment and it should be adopted, whether you would not invite a number of other amendments, because you are granting an exemption here of something that is not granted in any law so far as I have ever heard. Possibly the gentleman is familiar with some law that has such an exemption.

Mr. BOYLAN. What the gentleman says is true, but we should not be bound by mere precedent. We should establish precedents.

Mr. FREAR. But if you establish a precedent of this kind, are you not inviting precedents with respect to many other expenditures that may be made? That is the difficulty of the situation.

Mr. BOYLAN. I do not think there could be any other exemption of such a personal nature as this, where the preservation of health is involved.

I think every one of these amendments is a fair amendment.

Mr. FREAR. Suppose you have a lawsuit, and you have a very expensive attorney you are hiring just as you would a doctor, there may be hospital or perhaps other expenses required for necessary purposes.

Mr. BOYLAN. Well, the expenses of an attorney would not come under the same category as medical expenses.

Mr. FREAR. I understand; but does not the gentleman invite such amendments by establishing such an exemption? That is the only danger I see about it.

Mr. BOYLAN. I think this is the place to start these things. We should blaze the trail, and we should not wait for some State to suggest things for us to do. We should show the States what to do.

Will the gentleman accept the amendments? I trust he will.

Mr. MAPES. No; I can not accept the amendments. I want to ask for recognition when the gentleman has concluded.

Mr. BOYLAN. I have explained the amendments, and I ask their support and adoption by the committee. They are fair and just and reasonable.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendments.

Mr. Chairman, of course, how much exemption should be allowed to the taxpayer is a matter of judgment. It does not seem to the committee that it will be any hardship to a single man who is making $2,000 to pay a tax of 1 per cent upon his income over and above his exemption of $1,000. A single man would then pay on a $2,000 income 1 per cent on the excess above $1,000, or $10. It did not seem to the committee that this would be any hardship. The committee feels that the rates in this bill are low and reasonable. They conform pretty generally to the rates in the States.

I do not want to take the time of the committee unnecessarily. I imagine every member here has some conviction on this subject. It is not exactly parallel with the Federal law, but we are trying to adopt a law which we think will be fair and reasonable, patterned after the State income tax laws, to be applied here in the District of Columbia, after abolishing the present intangible personal-property tax.

There is this further thought in connection with the matter. The revenue to be derived from the rates proposed in this bill has been pretty carefully figured, and just what effect the gentleman's amendment would have on the total revenue to be raised I would not be prepared to say at this time.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. I would say to the gentleman that my amendments do not go to the rates fixed by the committee. They go to the matter of exemptions, and the mere fact that by mathematical computation you have figured out the yield under these exemptions is no reason why an injustice should be perpetrated upon the people of the District. In making these exemptions you do not follow the Federal act, and you do not follow any State law so far as I know. Certainly the State acts are generally predicated on the Federal act, the exemptions being the same.

Mr. MAPES. The committee does not think any injustice is being done to anybody under the rates here. Of course, the gentleman's amendments do not go to the rates but go to the equity of the whole matter as to how much should be exempt.

Of course, there are people who do not want to pay any income tax. They want the entire income, no matter how much it may be, to be free of taxation. The committee thought it would be fair and would not be burdensome to the people with an income of over $1,000 to pay at least 1 per cent on all income in excess of $1,000.

The gentleman's amendment in regard to hospital bills and doctors' bills, it seems to me, is a very dangerous amendment. There are other bills that men have to pay that are just as necessary as hospital and doctors' bills, and if we start putting in exemptions and saying to men, "No matter what your income is, if you have spent your money in this particular way, you will not have to pay an income tax," it will throw the doors wide open. A man with a quack doctor or something of that kind might be exempted from a great deal of tax.

Mr. BOYLAN. I do not think the argument of the gentleman applies, inasmuch as no man seeks medical or hospital treatment unless he is actually compelled to do so. A man may enter into a lawsuit or contract other expenses under entirely different circumstances.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYLAN. If a man were allowed to claim exemption for other things, of course, I assume that would open the door wide, but no one he wants to be sick if he can keep well.

He does not want to employ doctors or incur hospital expenses unless it is absolutely necessary. If he did I should think there was something the matter with his mental make-up.

Mr. FREAR. Suppose a case like this: An individual would like to go to a sanatorium, which is a hospital, and he stays there six months or a year. What would be the effect, and what would be the construction under the gentleman's proposed amendment?

Mr. BOYLAN. He would have to show that he was ill and required medical attention.

Mr. FREAR. And that would have to be passed upon by the assessor.

Mr. BOYLAN. He would have to have proper evidence submitted to him.

Mr. STAFFORD. Following the suggestion of my colleague, I know that there are persons who go to Battle Creek Sanitarium regularly for treatment for a month or two as a sort of rest. They are in fairly good health, but they are taking this vegetarian treatment, and under the wording of the gentleman's amendment, that person would be entitled to an exemption.

Mr. BOYLAN. In answer to the gentleman, I would say that many Members of Congress go to Battle Creek. They need to go after the strenuous sessions we have here. The benefit of that rest inures to the good of the country, for they come back rejuvenated and full of vigor, like the gentleman from Wisconsin, and able to stand on the floor and labor for the best interests of the country.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the logic of the gentleman's amendment, why should I not be entitled to expenses in going to the woods of Wisconsin to recuperate from the labors of the session?

Mr. BOYLAN. If the gentleman required medical care and took his physician with him, he should be entitled to an exemption.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendments were rejected.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 2, strike out the word "eighteen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty-one."

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, the most expensive age in the life of boys and girls, so far as parents are concerned, is between the ages of 18 and 21, when they are going to college, because at that time the parent not only has to support the child but also to pay tuition, or at least a part of it, even in those cases where the boy or girl may be halping to secure his education by working a part of the time. It is a most expensive time for the parent.

Where the father is earning a comparatively small salary and has a boy or a girl in college, or perhaps more than one, it is a very critical time, and is the time above all others when he should be entitled to an exemption. It seems to me that if you make the maximum age 21 you give the parent the exemption when he most needs it. If the boy and girl are at work, of course, they are not dependent and the exemption does not apply.

Some time ago I appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means in behalf of a similar amendment to the Federal income tax law, and the point that I made in this regard was well received by members of the committee, and at one time it looked as if the Committee on Ways and Means might report an amendment to this effect.

I am satisfied that a majority of the members of the committee believed in it, but they did not think it was wise at that time to report it because other more important matters were before them, and so nothing was done.

I appeal to the membership of this House to give serious consideration to this amendment. I know that many Members of the House have put their children through college, and they will know what it costs. Where a man on a comparatively small salary is trying to educate his children he will appreciate the importance of this amendment. The paragraph as amended will read:

Three hundred dollars for each dependent child under 21 years of age, and for each additional person who is actually supported by and entirely dependent on the taxpayer for his support.

It is carefully guarded. The amendment can do no harm, and it will be a positive blessing to countless parents in the District of Columbia. I trust the amendment will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I think we all have a great deal of sympathy with the sentiment expressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER]; but the truth is that in the average home the child of 18 years is usually working and has an income. This is the age in the Federal statute, and I would hate to see a different age adopted here for the District of Columbia. I know that men with limited incomes who are sending their children through college have some hardships in meeting expenses, but the average child does not go through college. As I say, this is the age that is in the Federal law, and I would hate to see the District bill jump the age three years higher than the age fixed in the Federal law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

IMPOSITION OF TAX

SEC. 10. A tax is hereby imposed upon every person, as herein defined, resident of the District of Columbia, which tax shall be levied, collected, and paid annually upon and with respect to his entire net income, as herein defined, at rates as follows:

(a) One per cent of the amount of net income not exceeding $2,000.

(b) One and one-half per cent of the amount of net income in excess of $2,000 but not in excess of $5,000.

(c) Two per cent of the amount of net income in excess of $5,000 but not in excess of $10,000.

(d) Two and one-half per cent of the amount of net income in excess of $10,000 but not in excess of $15,000.

(e) Three per cent of the amount of net income in excess of $15,000 and not in excess of $20,000.

(f) Three and one-half per cent of the amount of net income in excess of $20,000 but not in excess of $30,000.

(g) Four per cent of the amount of net income in excess of $30,000 but not in excess of $50,000.

(h) Five per cent of the amount of net income in excess of $50,000.

A like tax is hereby imposed and shall be levied, collected, and paid annually at the rate specified in this section upon and with respect to the entire net income as herein defined, except as otherwise herein provided, from all property owned and from every business, trade, profession, or occupation carried on in the District of Columbia by persons not residents of the District.

The tax herein provided shall be first levied, collected, and paid in the year 1933 upon and with respect to the taxable income for the calendar year 1932, or for any fiscal year ending during the year 1932.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BURTNESS: Page 13, line 7, after the figures "1932," strike out the comma and the balance of the line up to the period.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I think the bill as presented by the committee is a very fine piece of legislation, and any suggestion that I have made here to-day has been for the purpose of perfecting it and not otherwise. In a bill of this magnitude it is evident that we may have different viewpoints on various matters such as exact amount of exemptions and things of that sort, which do not go to the question of principle involved in the bill. The amendment that I have now offered is an amendment which I think would correct a very serious discrepancy in the bill, if I can read English language correctly. Surely it must be true that if we are going to start the imposition of an income tax on incomes of individuals and corporations, we should start it on all of them as of the same day, and we should not continue to tax intangibles, for instance, for the year 1931 against certain corporations and then compel some but not all of such corporations to start paying taxes upon the income earned in 1931 also or a part of such income.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. As far as I am concerned, and the other members of the committee with whom I have consulted, we are willing to accept the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. BURTNESS. So that the purpose may appear in the RECORD, may I state that if a corporation ended its fiscal year on March 1, 1932, it would have to pay an income tax from March 1, 1931 to 1932, or if their fiscal year ended on July 1, it would have to pay a tax for six months prior to the time when the rest of the corporations or individuals started to pay the income tax. The starting date for all should be January 1, 1932.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will investigate the matter, he will find that on intangibles the tax they paid is infinitesimal. Very few of them paid any intangible tax at all.

Mr. BURTNESS. I agree with the gentleman, and I commend the action of the committee in proposing this bill. The point is that beginning with January 1, 1932, all of them ought to pay the income tax on business done for that year and not before.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In view of the amendment just adopted, I rise to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether there must not be some provision made authorizing the assessor of incomes to have some other year for the assessment of incomes for those corporations who have a fiscal year different from the calendar year. Under the wording of the bill as reported a corporation would have been obliged to pay for the fiscal year as adopted by the corporation which ended during the year 1931. I do not find any provision whereby the corporation whose fiscal year ends differently from the calendar year, and there are many of them, to pay on the basis of that arrangement.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, the administration of the act is left with the assessor of the District under such regulations as he may see fit to promulgate. Personally, I have always felt that these income taxes ought to go along with the calendar year. It is simply a matter of bookkeeping.

Mr. STAFFORD. I strongly disagree with the gentleman's position as to having business corporations adjust their fiscal year to the calendar year. In the Federal income tax law and in the income tax law of Wisconsin, which was one of the pioneer States in the establishment of an income tax in place of a tax on incorporeal property, we recognize the need of having a provision whereby we permit corporations to pay their income taxes based on their fiscal year.

There are many large corporations which find it absolutely impracticable to have their fiscal year coterminus with the calendar year, and necessarily we must recognize that business arrangement. I think the gentleman should recognize that, and if the bill in its present form does not provide for it, I would feel impelled to offer an amendment to make provision for that condition of affairs.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. BURTNESS. As the one proposing the amendment, I, of course, agree with the gentleman that the bill should, either by implication or otherwise, make it possible for the fiscal year to end at some time other than January 1, and I take it for granted that the powers of administration given under section 17 are sufficient for that purpose. Surely, with the statement made by the chairman who is in charge of the legislation, that the language does make it possible to provide rules and regulations so as to bring that about, it would seem that would give the assessor and the courts a legislative construction that would probably be binding. Nevertheless, I think it might be well to have the safeguard in, but does the gentleman not think it is a minor amendment that could be taken care of in the Senate?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think perhaps my purpose has been accomplished by calling attention to it in the House, and if the Senate feels it is necessary, they can embody it in the proper language.

Mr. BURTNESS. In any event, I think the legislative intent is that such provision can be made by regulation.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is why I took issue with the chairman of the committee when he said that all returns should be based upon the calendar year.

Mr. BURTNESS. Of course, some businesses could not make returns on the basis of the calendar year.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

PENALTIES

SEC. 19. Any person as herein defined whose duty it is to file the income-tax return required hereby and who shall refuse or neglect to file such income-tax return shall be liable to a penalty of $500, to be recovered in an action to be brought by the legal department of the District government in the name of the people of the District.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of asking some member of the committee or some of the other representatives from States where a State income tax law is in operation, to give us a word of explanation concerning the enforcement of the collection provisions of the State income tax or District income tax. I do this because in our State and in other States where the question is now under discussion, one of the favorite arguments made in opposition is that the State income tax law is not enforceable and the tax is not collectible. It seemed to me that in this discussion, particularly in connection with this section and also section 15, it might be well to have a word with reference to the experience of States on that particular point. If the committee has any information, I would be glad to receive it, and if other gentlemen have any information I would be glad to receive that also at this point.

Mr. MAPES. I have had no experience as far as the State laws are concerned. I may say, however, that we do not anticipate any particular trouble in the administration of the laws in that respect in the District of Columbia on account of the Federal income tax law. I started to say, a provision was considered by the committee which would require the heads of the different departments in the Government to submit a list of the names of employees, the amount of their salaries, and so forth, to the District assessor. However, the committee did not look with favor upon that. It reached the conclusion that the assessor could get the information he needed without putting any such provision in the law. The office of the assessor and the office of the collector of customs of the District of Columbia do not feel that there will be any particular difficulty in enforcing the provisions of this bill as it stands.

Mr. STAFFORD. If I might trespass for a moment upon the House to reply to the gentleman's query——

Mr. KETCHAM. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. As far as the administration of the income tax law on personal property in the State of Wisconsin is concerned, I am not surprised that the opponents of State income tax legislation are raising all kinds of scarecrows, trying to prevent its adoption. In the State of Wisconsin, when this measure was adopted years ago, from securing only very minor returns from personal property, particularly on incorporeal property, intangible property, we have succeeded in having the salaried man and all other classes pay as faithfully as they pay under the national income tax law. It is true there are a few instances where persons have defaulted, and those instances are called to the attention of the district attorney by the assessor of taxes, and the district attorney begins suit; and if the man has property he must pay the tax, with the added interest imposed under the act as a penalty. Otherwise, execution will issue against his property.

I can not subscribe to the position taken by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] that the establishment of an income tax law by a State does not bring in additional revenue. I remember upon my entrance to the floor of this House 29 years ago Mr. Burleson, of Texas, later Postmaster General, called attention to the fact that Washington had become a Mecca for the tax dodgers of the country. They were coming here in large numbers for the sole purpose of evading the payment of taxes on intangibles, and an effort was then made to try to reach the intangibles. We succeeded in a little way, but not nearly so efficaciously as if this income tax law is adopted. This income tax law will reach everybody. There is also the national income-tax return, which will be available to determine the taxpaying class.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment to section 19.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAPES: Page 17, line 17, after the word "of," insert the words "not to exceed."

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I think the purpose of that amendment is clear. It provides that the penalty shall not exceed $500. The amendment will give the court discretion to inflict any penalty it sees fit up to $500. As the bill now reads the penalty in every case would be $500.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 20. If any corporation doing business in the District of Columbia refuses or neglects to comply with the requirements of this act or with the rules or regulations of the assessor of the District, relating to the administration of this act, or refuses or neglects to pay the tax herein provided, it shall not exercise any of its corporate powers or franchises or do any business whatsoever in the District of Columbia during the period it refuses or neglects to fully comply with all the requirements of this act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of completing the statement I just made. The gentleman from Massachusetts cited the State of Illinois, where they have no income tax law. What is the condition in the city of Chicago so far as the assessment of personal property is concerned? It is known to every person who has had any personal acquaintance with taxation in the city of Chicago that favoritism and underassessment is the rule with personal property there. Need I bring to the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts the fact that to-day Chicago is virtually bankrupt? It can not pay its teachers because of the methods followed in Illinois.

Mr. HOLADAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. HOLADAY. The condition which the gentleman outlines as existing in Illinois became so unsatisfactory that the governor called a special session of the legislature. The legislature is now in session and is to-day considering an income tax law for Illinois.

Mr. STAFFORD. The trouble with the governor and people of the State of Illinois is that they are 25 years behind the times. They are now forced to enact an income tax law. Why did not they take counsel from the State of Wisconsin 25 years ago? If they had done so, they would not have the condition which confronts them to-day.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SECRECY REQUIRED OF OFFICIALS AND EMPLOYEES

SEC. 21. It shall be unlawful for the assessor of the District of Columbia, his deputy, secretary, or clerk or other employee of his department, or any other person, to divulge or make known in any manner whatsoever not provided by law to any person the amount or source of income, profits, losses, expenditures, or any particular thereof, set forth or disclosed in any income-tax return filed with the said assessor by any person subject to taxation under this act, or to permit any such return, or copy thereof, or book containing any abstract or particulars thereof, to be seen or examined by any person, or to print or publish in any manner whatsoever any such return, or any part thereof, or source of income, profits, losses, or expenditures appearing in any such report. Any person who shall violate the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500, or he may be imprisoned for a period not exceeding 90 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any authorized representative of the United States Government or any authorized representative of any State government. Such representatives, upon written request, shall be permitted to examine such returns at such time as the assessor of the District may designate.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. This is not a pro forma amendment. It is a bona fide amendment, and I want to appeal to the membership here present to approve this amendment. It will be an entering wedge in restoring the wholesome provision in our tax laws making income-tax returns public records. The records of taxes on real estate are now matters of public record, and there is no reason why income-tax records should be clothed with secrecy.

We tried it one time and it worked very successfully, so successfully that they came in the next year, on the recommendation of Mr. Mellon, the Secretary of the Treasury, and repealed the publicity provision in our income tax law.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman have the backing of the Mellon-Mills Republican administration on his proposal?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Why does not the gentleman go further and provide that all income-tax matters shall be public?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We will soon have a tax bill, as the gentleman knows, and we will do it there.

Mr. BLANTON. When the gentleman says "We will," does he mean the Republicans or the Democrats?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I mean the House of Representatives will have an amendment to the existing tax law before it, and at that time we should make a drive to restore the publicity provision.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly we should.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Fine. So we might as well strike out this provision in order that the country may be advised that we will insist upon the restoration of the publicity provision of the Federal tax law.

Mr. BLANTON. After we pass it and the present President vetoes it, will the gentleman provide enough Republican votes over there on his side of the aisle to help us Democrats override him?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman can speak for one vote, that is his own, and he knows just how he is going to vote at all times.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to state that many of us have a good deal of sympathy with the principle stated by the gentleman from New York, but the members of the committee are particularly anxious to have these bills become law, and I think the gentleman from New York will agree that if we were to inject into this bill a highly controversial matter of that kind it will probably result in flagging the bill at the other end of the Capitol, or perhaps promote a veto by the President. This is in conformity with the existing law with respect to Federal income taxes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. May I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that I can not approve of any method of legislation in anticipation of what the Executive will do to a bill. Let us legislate according to our best judgment, and if we are met with a veto the Constitution provides exactly our rights in the matter. I think, judging from past experiences, that we are not going to be confronted with many vetoes in the future. I am ready to face the situation. For one, I want to go on record now as saying that I shall do everything possible at any time to restore the publicity provisions in our income tax law. I think they are wholesome, I think they are sound, and I think they are necessary.

Mr. DAVIS. I want to say that I will vote with the gentleman on that proposition, but we are right now confronted with the question of enacting a law and not of amending one that is already on the statute books.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, in addition to what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] has said let me suggest that, like the gentleman from Tennessee, I have a great deal of sympathy with the position taken by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] so far as the general proposition is concerned; but we are passing a bill here for the District of Columbia, and the gentleman from New York is well aware that the District does not take kindly to tax suggestions from the Congress. If we put in a provision of this kind applying to the District, that does not apply to the country generally. I am afraid we will be subject to just that much more criticism. I think it would be advisable, as the gentleman from Tennessee has suggested, for us to let this provision go along as written in the bill. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from New York will not be adopted.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I wish to say, however, I am thoroughly in favor of publicity, and was when the Federal law was originally passed. We worked as hard as we could to get such a proposition through Congress. However, I was amazed when I visited Mr. Philip Snowden at one time in London and was with him a couple of hours to learn his views on publicity. When I stated we were trying to get a provision with respect to publicity as we have in our own State of Wisconsin through Congress, he said that he was opposed to it, and he gave reasons which seemed to him to be of value, and they have not adopted such a provision in England.

I can see no objection to it and am heartily for it; but I would not want to bring it up at this stage of the proceedings for fear we may endanger the bill, as the chairman of the special committee and as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] have both well said. For that reason I am opposed to it at this time, but if such an amendment is offered afterwards I shall support it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCMILLAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5821) to provide for the taxation of incomes in the District of Columbia, to repeal certain provisions of law relating to the taxation of intangible personal property in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MAPES, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ESTATE TAX FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5822) to provide a tax on transfers of estates of decedents, and pending that, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be limited to 1 hour, 30 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] and 30 minutes by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5822, and pending that motion asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 1 hour, 30 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] and 30 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether it is his purpose to conclude the consideration of the bill this evening.

Mr. MAPES. The committee would like to go along as long as it can reasonably, but it has no desire to keep the House here unduly late, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is nearing 4 o'clock, and an hour of general debate would bring us to the usual time of adjournment. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to conclude general debate to-night and consider the bill under the 5-minute rule at some future session?

Mr. SNELL. I understood from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], the majority leader, if the moratorium proposition is ready to-morrow, the gentleman would take it up; but if it is not ready, I do not know of anything to come up in preference to this measure, but I am not authorized to make such a statement.

Mr. BACHARACH. The committee is still holding hearings on the moratorium bill, and I do not see how the bill can possibly be ready to-morrow.

Mr. MAPES. As the minority leader has stated, the understanding I have had with the majority leader is that these bills will proceed except for consideration of the moratorium measure. When the Ways and Means Committee is ready with that bill, the House will proceed with its consideration, otherwise we are to proceed with these measures until they are passed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would it be agreeable to the gentleman that we only have general debate on this measure this afternoon?

Mr. MAPES. That is all right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES]?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5822, with Mr. MCMILLAN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

H. R. 5822

A bill to provide a tax on the transfers of estates of decedents.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I shall only take a few moments of your time in the discussion of this particular bill. Estate taxes, as you may know, have been passed by 46 of the 48 States, so it is not a new question. We have it in the Federal law. It is practically no increased burden upon the District of Columbia in this case, because 80 per cent under the present law—which I think is more than it should be—is returned to the State or municipality under the law—in this case, the District.

The bill we have is a general bill prepared along the lines of the report of the National District Tax Association. There is no particular difference in the rates, so far as I know.

There is an exemption of $20,000 for the widow of a deceased, where there is one, and an exemption of $10,000 for the husband, where there is one. Then there are smaller amounts for brothers and sisters. It is a regular estate tax instead of an inheritance tax.

It begins with 1 per cent on the net income up to $50,000. From that on it is increased regularly, until over $2,000,000 and not to exceed $5,000,000, is taxed at the rate of 10 per cent, and over $5,000,000, the largest amount, is at 15 per cent. The other provisions are for administration and are general provisions that accompany laws of this kind, and are practically the same as in the States, and provisions by the national commission.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has referred to the exemption for the husband, which is one-half of that allowed for the widow. Under the Wisconsin law the husband is granted the same exemption as a child. The widow is entitled to an exemption of $15,000. But I rise more to ask an explanation of what I regard as rather an unfavorable disparagement in the amount of exemption granted to the brother and sister, namely, $5,000, and to the child, $2,000. That seems to me a glaring inequality.

The committee will find that on page 7, paragraph 8.

Mr. FREAR. There is no reason I have to offer, except that is the rate suggested by the commission. Is my colleague familiar with the Wisconsin statute?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am. There is no such large exemption accorded to brother and sister.

Mr. FREAR. What is the exemption under our statute?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is $2,000 to children and, as I recall, $500 to brothers and sisters. Under the Wisconsin law the rate is graduated according to the degree of consanguinity and the amount of the estate that devolves.

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. It seemed to me a rather striking difference, which could hardly be justified, to accord a child only $2,000, and in most instances they are minor children, and brothers and sisters $5,000.

Mr. BURTNESS. Is not the gentleman inclined to think that there may be a transposition of the figures, that at least $5,000 ought to be allowed a child, while a couple of thousand dollars might be afforded to the brother and sister?

Mr. STAFFORD. That was the purpose of my rising. I wanted to call attention to an obvious inconsistency.

Mr. FREAR. If the gentleman will withhold, I think that he will learn that that is the fact before the item is reached in the bill. It would seem to be a mistake in drawing the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. And that was the purpose of my suggestion that this matter go over until to-morrow, so far as the reading of the bill is concerned under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. FREAR. That is the way to leave it now, and that is the only statement I care to make unless some other gentlemen desire to ask questions. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON].

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Chairman, after listening to discussions of this body on the President's message, and especially after listening to the distinguished Member from New York, HAMILTON FISH, and the noted constitutionalist from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK], I concluded, believing as I do that this Government is suffering, and has been for years, from an overindulgence of Hamiltonian doctrines that now is a most appropriate time for a Jeffersonian speech.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] said that he was for sustaining the President on the moratorium. And in effect he added that the international bankers had taken $2,000,000,000 of American money and built up European industries which were thereby put in competition with American industries. However, he said: "I want my day later to go after the international bankers."

To me it was not clear why the job should be put off to a later day. Why not act now?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK], who has gained an enviable reputation for his views on the Constitution, suddenly becomes the party hack and pleads, with tears in his voice, to sustain the President. He says the President, in his negotiations on the moratorium, was acting within his constitutional rights. He goes on to say that it is "the wise policy to give to him a very generous and broad discretion." This means a loose, liberal construction of the Executive's rights under the Constitution.

I feel mighty glad that the party of which I am a member has always stood for a strict construction of the Constitution, believing that to be the only way we could perpetuate it as well as preserve the liberties of the people.

It is unfortunate that one so able and with a reputation to sustain, as Mr. BECK has, would not think that there is something of far greater importance to consider in this matter than a mere political party, or even a mere administration. The very Government itself is involved. Shall it last, or shall it go the way of all republics of the past?

If I remember correctly, the gentleman from Pennsylvania says the crash will come if the administration is not sustained. He adds in the course of his speech that the international bankers and the people of America are so thoroughly interlinked that it would be a great disaster if relief is not furnished. I could not help but think, when the gentleman said this: To what extent was the interlinking between the mass of the people and the international bankers? Was it only on the debit side that they interlinked, to share in the losses? For I am sure that nobody in the part of the country that I come from has shared in any of the tremendous commissions paid to the international bankers for the money borrowed through them to rebuild the industries of Europe.

Many Members are sitting in this House to-day who feel their position on this question was complicated somewhat by the message sent to them by the President and the answer they gave thereto. It is to be regretted that the Members were so hasty in replying. As for myself, when I received the message I read it and reread it and then read it again. However, I had previously received numerous questionnaires asking me how I stood on certain questions and how I would vote on them. I always read these communications carefully and then filed them for future reference. So that when I received the President's message I concluded I would just place it along with the other questionnaires and wait until I could see what the propositions were that I would be called to vote upon before giving an expression. I have so often found that questionnaires are not sent to put you on record but merely to put you in a hole.

I feel the Members are not bound by anything that has taken place in this connection, because I find—while I am not a constitutional lawyer, great or near great—that the Constitution provides the only way a yea-and-nay vote can be taken on any proposition is by the request of one-fifth of the Members, unless that provision be liberally construed and the President be deemed to have a right to call for a private vote. So I feel that the Members were imposed upon, and I assure them, if they see fit to change their vote from that which was given in the private poll, their constituents will not call them to account for it. Let your conscience be your guide in this matter. I, for one, stand open and free on the question. I am neither for nor against it, and my vote will be recorded yea or nay, according to the merits of the case.

If I believed I would be serving humanity, or that I would be serving the German people or the German Republic, it would influence me very much. But if I am to be used as a mere cat's-paw to take care of the loans of a lot of money changers, and thereby add further to the American depression, I will not vote for it.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], in discussing the question of the Executive's sidestepping the Constitution, said that that was "not a matter that ought to be introduced into this solemn discussion of what should be done to save the world." This was most magnanimous on the part of the benevolent gentleman from Massachusetts, but if we are to save the world, why not begin by protecting and saving America?

I purpose to try to make clear the importance of one thing, that when Jefferson found it necessary to establish a political party, he did so with this in mind: That it would be truly a national party.

Senator George F. Hoar, a great Republican Senator from Massachusetts, said on one occasion that—

> Every American political sect finds its political doctrine in Jefferson, almost as every religious sect finds its doctrine in the Savior of mankind.

In the great campaign between Stephen A. Douglas and Abraham Lincoln in the State of Illinois invariably, when Mr. Lincoln was pushed to the wall in debate, he would reply to Mr. Douglas by saying:

> I stand squarely where Thomas Jefferson stood. I am fighting in the Jeffersonian, Washingtonian, Madisonian way.

In the campaign preceding the 1861 conflict Mr. Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi, afterwards President of the Southern Confederacy, went into the State of Massachusetts, as well as all the other New England States, and appealed to the Democrats to stand as one. He said in a speech at Faneuil Hall, Boston:

> There is grave danger ahead if the party [meaning that of Jefferson] disintegrates. Remember always that the pulse of a Democrat beats the same whether it is in Massachusetts or Mississippi.

Almost at that very moment Mr. Lincoln took his pen in hand—to be exact as to the time, it was on April 6, 1859—and wrote a letter addressed to H. L. Pierce and others, in the city of Boston, replying to their invitation to address the Republicans in a Thomas Jefferson birthday celebration, and in it he said:

> My engagements are such that I can not come.

But then he went on to say in this letter that something unusual had happened, that the Republicans of that time were the real Jeffersonians, and that the party of the opposition had ceased to be the representative party of Jefferson. Then he added this tribute to Jefferson:

> All honor to Jefferson—to the man, who, in the concrete pressure of a struggle for national independence by a single people, had the coolness, forecast, and sagacity to introduce into a merely revolutionary document an abstract truth applicable to all men and all times, and so embalm it there that to-day and in all coming days it shall be a rebuke and a stumbling block to the very harbingers of reappearing tyranny and oppression.

In this letter he also said:

> The Republican Party is for both property and man; in case of conflict, for man first.

How far the modern Republican organization has drifted from this in its efforts to serve the privileged few is evidenced by the economic developments of the present era of industrial aggrandizement.

MISSOURI IN JEFFERSONIAN LEADERSHIP

My own State of Missouri, in the great struggle between the States, furnished ample evidence that the political mantle of Jefferson was intended to cover all. We have it in the history of the outstanding public men of our great city of St. Louis, patriotically exemplified in that splendid soldier and statesman, Frank P. Blair, who espoused the cause of the North, organizing the first company of Union men in the South. He was a Jeffersonian. We have it in the life of that great military commander, Gen. D. M. Frost, who, as patriotically devoted to his own ideals, espoused the cause of the Southern States. Both were Jeffersonians. Let me bring it more closely down to a later day in Missouri's affairs. I shall pick four men famous in public life. Boone, Pettis, Johnson, and Saline Counties furnished them. However, all Missouri remembers and honors them. Their names are Crittenden, Cockrell, Vest, and Philips.

Thomas Theodore Crittenden, who had served in the Congress of the United States prior to the war, was a brave soldier of the North, a Kentuckian by birth, a Jeffersonian in politics. After the war he was Governor of Missouri and Minister to Mexico.

Francis Marion Cockrell was a soldier of the Confederacy, and in Pollard's great Southern History of the War Between the States he gives special praise to Cockrell and his legion as having conducted themselves in a brave and gallant way. In after years he was a famous Missouri statesman, and all his life he was a Jeffersonian.

Then let us look upon Missouri's two great scholars, also of that period: First, John F. Philips, who was a Member of Congress several times after the conflict between the States, and who had performed heroic service as a soldier in the army of Lincoln and afterwards achieved honor and distinction as a distinguished jurist in the Federal courts of this Nation. He likewise was a Jeffersonian.

Last, but not least of the four by any means, let us recall George Graham Vest, that great statesman who served his State as both Congressman and Senator in the Confederacy. We find him closing his career politically in the Congress of the reunited States wherein he served 24 years as a Senator. From the beginning to the end of his splendid career he was a Jeffersonian and an eloquent and outspoken one.

The mere difference of section, or the intensity of conflict between the sections, in no way separated these men from their beliefs in the teachings of Jefferson.

JEFFERSON STILL IGNORED

President Lincoln once said: "It is now no child's play to save the principles of Jefferson from total overthrow in this Nation." This is as applicable to-day as it was when Abraham Lincoln said it in 1859. Those who are interested in the suppression of the teachings of Jefferson are constantly at work. I have in my hand a clipping which contains a statement issued by an organization of to-day known as the Constitutional Education Association. It was sent throughout the Nation as a copyrighted newspaper article. It names, in a peremptory way, as the six greatest American statesmen, Franklin, Washington, Hamilton, Marshall, Webster, and Lincoln. It characterizes them as the men who were most effective in establishing the Constitution and carrying forward its sequence. It undertakes to specify their contribution to that document in this way:

Benjamin Franklin is most intimately associated with the preparation of the Constitution, George Washington with its creation, Alexander Hamilton with its ratification, John Marshall with its interpretation, Daniel Webster with its exposition, and Abraham Lincoln with its preservation.

Not one word is said of Jefferson's connection therewith, nor of what the Jeffersonians, headed by Madison, Mason, Monroe, and others, contributed. Mr. Jefferson was minister to France at the time. He took his pen in hand after seeing the proposed Constitution and wrote to his friend James Madison and others:

There is a great mass of good in it, in a very desirable form, but there is also to me a bitter pill or two. I will now add what I do not like: First, the omission of a bill of rights providing clearly and without the aid of sophism freedom of religion, freedom of the press, protection against standing armies, restrictions against monopolies, the eternal and unremitting force of habeas corpus laws and trials by jury in all matters of fact triable by the laws of the land and not by the laws of the Nation. A bill of rights is what the people are entitled to against every government on earth.

WHAT JEFFERSON GAVE TO THE CONSTITUTION

Then the Jeffersonians commenced to patch this document in accordance with Jefferson's ideas. Patch No. 1, which is amendment No. 1 to the Constitution as framed by the fathers—

Religious liberty, freedom of speech, right of petition: Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religious belief, or preventing the free exercise thereof or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press or of the right of the people peacefully to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievance.

Patch No. 2. The right to bear arms. This was intended as a State right and as a people's right to bear arms for their own protection.

Patch No. 3. Soldiers shall not be quartered in private houses.

Patch No. 4. Search and seizure. The right of the people to be secure in their persons, homes, papers, and effects against unreasonable search and seizures.

Patch No. 5. Rights of persons accused of crime. (This carries with it the necessity of a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, which prohibits the use of a defendant to be made a witness against himself or to be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.)

Patch No. 6. In criminal prosecution the accused shall be entitled to a speedy trial.

Patch No. 7. Trial by juries guaranteed.

Patch No. 8. Excessive bail prohibited.

Patches 9 and 10 have to do with the preservation of the rights of the States.

All of the foregoing provisions, now the constitutional law of the Nation, were put into the Constitution by amendments inspired by Thomas Jefferson and sponsored by his political followers. They were not in the original draft of the Constitution.

The Constitutional Education Society was both prejudicially blind and deaf to what Jefferson and Jefferson's followers did. Let me make up their oversight. All that Jefferson and his followers did was to humanize the Constitution. These Jeffersonian patches are America's bill of rights.

I feel free to assert that the life of Jefferson has not been taught to the children of America as it should have been purely from an educational standpoint. Concerning holidays, many of the States have both a Washington and a Lincoln day. Rightfully so; but concerning the schools, George Washington had something to do with the early school system; Mr. Lincoln had nothing to do with it. His was a work of another kind. But on the part of Jefferson, Jefferson had everything to do, fundamentally, with the schools of America and the struggle for the education of the masses. Yet to-day there are but three States in the Union that have a Jefferson holiday: One is Alabama; Missouri now has one, only recently enacted by the general assembly; and Florida has followed Missouri with one also, which makes three—two being of most recent enactment.

THE SPONSOR OF FREE SCHOOLS AND UNIVERSITIES

Jefferson in his early life made a fight in the House of Burgesses of the Colony of Virginia to the end and purpose that the children of all should have the benefit of free schooling. In this he was opposed and four times suffered defeat at the hands of the aristocracy of his State for the reason that they did not purpose to be taxed to educate the children of the poor. This did not deter Jefferson. He continued the struggle until finally, after many, many years, the Colony and later the State of Virginia gave to the children what they were rightfully entitled to, educational facilities at public expense.

Jefferson held many places of high and of modest honors. He was not only a President of the United States, he was also a Vice President; he was a Secretary of State; he was a minister to France; he was a Member of the Continental Congress; he was a member of the House of Burgesses of the Colony of Virginia; he was a justice of the peace; he was a vestryman of the Episcopal Church. When he came to write the things he wished to be remembered by, he forgot all of these honors and plainly indicated that he wished to have engraved upon his tombstone only three achievements:

Here was buried Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of American Independence, of the statute of Virginia for religious freedom, and founder of the University of Virginia.

He founded the University of Virginia, of which he was rector until his death. Over its doors he caused to be inscribed a motto. I have always felt that the child going to school should have something to connect its school days with the hereafter, something that would be lastingly impressed upon the mind of the child. "God is here. God is everywhere. God is just." Just something so that the child would make a connection between its worldly education and the life to come. I felt often that maybe it could not be. Always I had the dread that in things religious an interpretation by an unwise school-teacher might be injurious to the child. I never realized I was sensing a sound Jeffersonian doctrine until I stood at this great Virginia institution of learning, founded by Jefferson, and learned that the motto he had written for that university was, "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make ye free." This was taken fresh from the lips of the Savior, and every child, boy or girl, who goes to the University of Virginia will always remember that the motto of that great institution, selected by Thomas Jefferson, was one connecting the Savior of Mankind with its education.

Again let me add that practically all of the great ideas of aim, administration, and curriculum which dominated the nineteenth century American universities were anticipated by Jefferson. I am not saying this. That is what the Encyclopedia Britannica says of Jefferson's university ideals, and still this great champion of education is practically unknown to the American child, still deliberately ignored by the educators and molders of public opinion in our country.

JEFFERSON'S PRACTICAL EDUCATIONAL PLAN

Prof. James C. Carter, in 1898, at the University of Virginia, recalled an occasion when there had been a meeting in 1818 in Virginia at which there was present the then President of the United States, James Monroe, and two ex-Presidents, Thomas Jefferson and James Madison.

At that meeting there was read the celebrated report prepared by Jefferson for the commission appointed by the governor, which contained in effect his definitions of the objects of primary education. It was as follows:

1. To give to every citizen the information he needs for the transaction of his own business.
2. To enable him to calculate for himself and to express and preserve his ideas, his contracts, and accounts in writing.
3. To improve, by reading, his morals and faculties.
4. To understand his duties to his neighbors and country and to discharge with competence the functions confided to him by either.
5. To know his rights; to exercise with order and justice those he retains; to choose with discretion the fiduciary of those he delegates; and to notice their conduct with diligence, with candor, and judgment.
6. And, in general, to observe with intelligence and faithfulness all the social relations under which he shall be placed.

This statement of the objects of primary education—will never be improved. It ought to be written in letters of gold and hung in every primary school throughout the land and be known by heart to every teacher and child therein. It is, indeed, more than a statement of the elements of rudimentary education. It is an enumeration of the duties of every good citizen under a popular government.

Said Professor Carter—

Let me add how sadly I have found that Professor Carter's admonition in this respect has been ignored. I have frequently met school-teachers who were puzzled as to which was which, Thomas Jefferson or Jefferson Davis, so little had they been taught about Jefferson and the things he stood for. I purpose to give before I am through the real reasons why the teachings of Jefferson have been suppressed and why a persistent campaign of belittlement and abuse has been conducted against his teachings from his own day to the present time, when we find a presumptive "educational" society has gone so far as to omit his name from the great contributors to the letter and spirit of our Constitution.

A GENIUS AS WELL AS A STATESMAN

Jefferson was the father of so many things. He was the father of fast mails. When he was Secretary of State he was the father of the patent system. All the early patents were issued by him as Secretary of State.

He was a great inventor, but patented nothing himself. His contention was that when one was blessed with genius he should devote its use to the benefit of mankind. Invariably upon Jefferson's inventing anything he immediately gave it to the public. The models of his inventions are on exhibition at Monticello.

Jefferson was the father of the almighty dollar. He was responsible, or, rather, he was the author of the coinage act of the United States, and whenever you have a 10-cent piece in your hand or a dollar or a $10 gold piece, you have in hand an evidence of one of the acts of Jefferson, wherein he fixed the unit of value. But he never made the dollar the standard of citizenship.

The children of the United States have been fed up by the press on George Graham Vest's famous speech on the dog, in which he said the dog was the best friend man ever had. But why not give to the child something that Vest had to say on Thomas Jefferson as a friend of man? It is a most beautiful tribute. It would thrill not only a child but any man or woman who will read it. Let me quote from George Graham Vest's great utterance on Jefferson, delivered in the city of St. Louis before the Jefferson Club on October 31, 1895:

On June 21, 1775, Jefferson took his seat as a Member of the Continental Congress, and in June, 1776, wrote, with his own hand, the Declaration of American Independence, the most sublime enunciation, save one, ever made to the human race. That "All governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed" is but a corrollary of the divine injunction "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." Together these two great truths embrace all the rights and duties of mankind.

To Jefferson we owe eternal gratitude for his sublime confidence in popular government and his unfaltering courage in defending at all times and in all places the great truth, that "All governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed."

The love of liberty is found not in palaces, but with the poor and oppressed. It flutters in the heart of the caged bird, and sighs with the worn and wasted prisoner in his dungeon. It has gone with martyrs to the stake, and kissed their burning lips as the tortured spirit winged its flight to God!

In the temple of this deity Jefferson was high priest! For myself, I worship no mortal man living or dead; but if I could kneel at such a shrine, it would be with uncovered head and loving heart at the grave of Thomas Jefferson.

THE FRIEND OF EQUALITY AND FREEDOM

Jefferson fought the ancient English laws of entails and primogeniture so that there should be no distinction between the rights of children and that all American children should stand on an equality in the sharing of property. When he was making this fight, to abolish the odious custom that had resulted in the building up of a vast landed aristocracy, he was confronted with great opposition. This opposition finally had to give way, and when he was about to complete this great change in the passing of property, he was appealed to, to be at least as fair as was the custom under the ancient Jewish laws, whereby the oldest boy received a double portion. Jefferson's reply was:

Yes, I think that on proper showing the oldest boy should have a double portion; however, he should be made to show that he does double the work, or eats double the amount of food, otherwise he should share equally with the youngest or the rest of the children.

I contend that Thomas Jefferson said things more terrific in their indictment of human slavery and things more beautiful in his praise of those who were trying to abolish human slavery from the world than Henry Ward Beecher, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Wendell Phillips, and Lloyd Garrison all put together, and still Jefferson as an enemy of slavery is almost unknown in the school histories. How few realize that as a young man, then a member of the House of Burgesses of Virginia, he fought to do away with the expulsion law which sent out of the colony the slave that had earned the good will of the master to such an extent that the master gave him his freedom. The property laws demanded that he leave instantly the colony lest he be a disturbing element.

Jefferson took the position that if the manumitted slave had earned the good will and the trust of those about him, he should be permitted to live and die among his people. Four times he was defeated in this contention. There are 49 utterances of Jefferson on the question of human slavery, any one of which would thrill the heart of every lover of human freedom. And this notwithstanding he was the man who taught all the States the correctness of the doctrine of State rights as one of the fundamental principles of interstate harmony and of national freedom.

How few to-day realize that when Jefferson wrote the immortal document of independence, he incorporated in his original draft of it a vigorous indictment of the King of England for having made war upon these unfortunate people of another race who had harmed him in no way, put them aboard his ships, many of them dying horrible deaths in transit to the Colonies. He indicted him further for having set up markets for their sale, and when the Continental Congress came to vote on these arraignments they were stricken from the Declaration of Independence. This was done mostly through the influence of New England shipowners, who said:

It wouldn't do to condemn England for the very thing that we shipowners are making profit out of.

Little Rhode Island alone had over 100 ships engaged in the slave traffic. Property influence prevailed even in the framing of that immortal document, and the indictment against England for encouraging slavery was stricken from the Declaration of Independence.

JEFFERSON AND THE THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT

While a Member of the Continental Congress, Jefferson was appointed one of the committee to draft the laws which were to govern the territory soon to be admitted as States to the Union. It comprised that portion of the country which is now Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, and Kentucky. He, on that occasion, reported an ordinance which reads as follows:

Slavery, abolition of: After the year 1800 of the Christian era, there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in any of the said States otherwise than in punishment of crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted to have been personally guilty.

This ordinance was lost by a single vote of a single Member of Congress from one of the States. The vote was by States. Seven States were necessary; six States voted for it. Had there not been a Member from New Jersey ill at the time, it would have carried. That was 81 years before the thirteenth amendment was adopted.

Now, let me read to you the thirteenth amendment to our Constitution as introduced by John B. Henderson, a Missouri Senator, and passed by Congress in the year 1865, February 1:

SECTION 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

If you will compare the Jefferson ordinance and the thirteenth amendment, you will find not only the thought but the wording almost exactly the same, so that when Senator Henderson came to write the thirteenth amendment he simply went to the defeated ordinance of Thomas Jefferson and adopted it word for word and put it into the Constitution.

Jefferson said, concerning the failure of his ordinance:

There were 10 States present; 6 voted unanimously for it, 3 against it, and 1 was divided; and 7 votes being requisite to decide the proposition affirmatively, it was lost. The voice of a single individual of the State which was divided, or of one of those which were of the negative, would have prevented this abominable crime from spreading itself over the new country. Thus we see the fate of millions unborn hanging on the tongue of one man, and Heaven was silent in that awful moment! But it is to be hoped it will not always be silent, and that the friends to the right of human nature will in the end prevail.

Had Jefferson's ordinance prevailed, the War between the States would have been averted; the sufferings which grew out of that war would never have taken place. Jefferson's last thoughts on this question were these. As his life was drawing to a close he said, "I am too old to make this fight. This will have to pass to the shoulders of others. All I can offer now are the weapons of an old man, my prayers." He had said, "Remember, it is written in the book of fate that these people shall be free."

I have frequently referred to this and been confronted fronted later by men of the Negro race who said, "But Jefferson taught that the races shouldn't live side by side, that there should be a separation and that the white man should assume responsibility, should educate and train the Negro and find a habitation for him." They said, "Do you think he was fair in that?" "Well," I replied, "in the light of what happened later, I would think that the Jefferson of his time was eminently fair, for we find seventy-odd years afterwards Abraham Lincoln, the Emancipator, saying the same thing."

On August 14, 1862, addressing a deputation of colored men, President Lincoln expressed clearly his belief that the colonization of that race would be the wisest solution of the difficulties which he foresaw would grow out of the emancipation of the race. In the course of that address he said:

We have between us a broader difference than exists between almost any other two races. Whether it is right or wrong I need not discuss, but this physical difference is a great disadvantage to us both, as I think. Your race suffers very greatly, many of them, by living among us, while ours suffers from your presence. In a word, we suffer on each side. If this is admitted, it affords a reason, at least, why we should be separated. * * * It is better for us, therefore, to be separated.

JEFFERSON ON RELIGIOUS FREEDOM

It was no easy fight for Jefferson and his followers to dislodge the clergy selected and appointed from England by the Church of England, and paid by tithes in the colony of Virginia. When Jefferson undertook this great fight, which took years and years to win, and when victory was about to be attained and he was about to achieve the complete divorcement of church and state, he was confronted by two great men, who said to him: "Jefferson, you are right in divorcing the church and state, but you are going too far. Let the taxes for church purposes be collected from each person and then permit him to designate to what particular church he wishes the taxes diverted." And then Jefferson gave utterance to this characteristic declaration: "I have sworn, upon the altar of God, eternal hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man." And he pushed forward with his work. How few remember in these days that the two men he had to defeat in the final struggle were none other than Patrick Henry and George Washington, the Father of his Country. Why wouldn't this be interesting reading, not only for school children but for grownups as well?

The responsibility for this failure on the part of America to understand its greatest statesman, or rather to know something of him beyond the fact that he wrote the Declaration of Independence is due to the doctrines he taught, which had to do with the menace of wealth—the encroachments of the "big rich." He taught that if there ever was a chosen people of God it was those who tilled the soil. In this he was right, even as it is handed down to us by history and tradition, because the ancient Jewish people were tillers of the soil. He taught that if happiness was to be ours it had to come primarily from those who tilled the soil. He taught that there should be no centralization of government; likewise, that there should be no centralization of wealth. His teachings warn us that every device of legislation should be used to keep down the building of great fortunes, lest it lead in the end to tyranny.

All his writings bring us to the conviction that he believed in a multiplicity of well-to-do people scattered over the land and not a few very, very great rich centered in a corner of the land. He taught a doctrine which would be of grave danger to the captains of these great fortunes were the children of this land to know that Jefferson believed in the right of revolt under oppression either of tyranny or wealth. He said he would not give a fig for a people who did not have the spirit of revolt in their blood, lest those who are their agents might forget whose Government this is; that to keep this fact in mind an occasional uprising of the people in protection of their rights was a wholesome thing. Surely these great captains of wealth would not want the children to become acquainted with such dangerous doctrines or to come out of school and find that the vast fortunes piled up in the hands of a few had abridged their opportunities, leaving nothing in sight for the boy or the girl facing the world in the country of Jefferson but the meager chance of securing employment at Sears-Roebuck or Montgomery Ward's or at some other centralized institution.

This, and this alone, is responsible for the motives of the "big rich" in keeping dark the things that Jefferson taught.

Many masquerade as Jeffersonians in one party who are not Jeffersonians at all, and some there are in other parties not bearing his name who are really Jeffersonians. The principles of Jefferson are in their mere infancy, so far as government application is concerned. The principles of Alexander Hamilton are to-day functioning 100 per cent in the national Government. The teachings of Jefferson were intended not merely for party purposes but to perpetuate the Republic; departure from the teachings of Jefferson means that this Republic will soon follow in the footsteps of those republics which fairly dotted the old world long before this one was ever thought of. The perpetuation of this Republic, if it is to be, must be through a return to the teachings of Jefferson.

THE OPPOSING IDEALS OF HAMILTON AND JEFFERSON

Alexander Hamilton believed and often asserted that the people is a beast and has to be led. He taught that the well-born and rich should have something more than the great mass of people. Jefferson taught this was a government of the people, and that the humblest had as great a voice in it as the richest. He had sublime confidence in the judgment of the people. Sometimes it looks as though he were mistaken. The people fail to grasp the importance of a people's government. Mr. Thomas Watson, of Georgia, a great historian and great statesman, wrote concerning Hamilton, that "Hamilton had hardly taken off his hat and settled in his office as Secretary of the Treasury before he began to write laws to please the rich, to enlist the rich, to additionally enrich the rich."

Let me quote from an article in the La Follette newspaper, the Progressive, which states that in 1920, 33 people had an annual income of $1,000,000 or more; in 1928 this had grown to 504 people with such incomes. In 1920 four people had an annual income in excess of $5,000,000; in 1928, 36 people had such an income. In 1920, 3,167 people had an annual income in excess of $100,000, and at the later date the number had grown to 14,242. This all in the first eight years of the reign of Andrew Mellon, sitting in the key place of government, the place which Hamilton held. It has been frequently said that Andrew Mellon is the greatest Secretary the Nation has had since the days of Hamilton. He surely meets Tom Watson's description of what Hamilton stood for in the way of additionally enriching the rich.

There has been at times in this country a real effort on the part of many men to revive and to make effective the teachings of Jefferson. Jefferson said there was no proper regulation of monopoly proposed by the Constitution. In 1889 and 1890 the men who composed the Congress of the United States believed that monopoly would soon destroy the little fellow in trade everywhere. The Sherman antitrust law was the outgrowth of this feeling. In December, 1889, John Sherman introduced his famous measure to regulate combinations in restraint of trade, known as the Sherman antitrust law. In that body were many great men, among whom were George Edmunds, of Vermont; George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, a great Senator; J. Z. George, of Mississippi; Senator John Reagan, of Texas; Cockrell and Vest, of Missouri; Plumb and Ingalls, of Kansas. This measure finally passed the Senate of the United States by an affirmative vote of 51 and a single negative vote. It reached the lower House of Congress and, under the leadership of Silver Dick Bland, passed with not a negative vote recorded. The measure was signed by the President of the United States and became a law in June, 1890.

For 21 years this measure weathered the courts. On two occasions the Supreme Court of the United States sustained it. In 1911, 21 years after its enactment, two struggling infant industries—namely, the American Tobacco Co. and the Standard Oil Co.—with their heads hardly above water, in great distress, through their hired agents made an appeal, saying: "We can not get justice from the people; we can not get justice from the Congress of the United States. We want justice. We are here appearing before the Supreme Court for a new interpretation of the Sherman antitrust law." And 21 years after its passage the Supreme Court, through its Chief Justice, White, wrote the infamous decision wherein it was declared that in the light of reason, the rule of reason is that Congress meant to say not all combinations in restraint of trade, but all combinations in "undue" restraint of trade.

A JUDGE-MADE LAW

The Supreme Court of the United States wrote the word "undue" into the Sherman Act and thereby took the teeth out of it, and there has not been a bad trust in the United States since that day. Justice Harlan, a member of the court, in a minority opinion said:

> If Congress meant to say that, why didn't it say it? And it has had 21 years to say it in and hasn't said it yet. You at this late day write that word into the act.

He further said:

> You are not interpreting the law, you are not rendering a decision based upon the act, you are writing the act. You are performing a function that was never intended you were to perform. This is judicial legislation, not judicial interpretation.

How the trusts must have trembled when President Hoover, a few months ago, named as a new Chief Justice a gentleman who was one of the affirming members of the court that voted to take the teeth out of the antitrust law, Charles E. Hughes. And now the trusts are crying for more privileges, and the President responds. In his message he says, concerning the antitrust laws, that there is wide conviction that some changes should be made, especially in the procedure under these laws. He adds: "* * * I do not favor their repeal * * *." Why, the truth of it is they have not had anything but privileges since the law was put upon the books. First, they had Executive permits by inaction, and then they have had judicial permits, and now they are clamoring for something more. If there is anything left for them to get in the way of Executive and judicial favors, I do not know what it is. Remember that the State courts sustained their trust laws; remember that the decision in this particular Standard Oil case, which originated in eastern Missouri, was unanimously sustained by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, and the opinion of that court, which was set aside by the United States Supreme Court, should be known to everyone. The special concurring opinion of Judge Hook should be read by every citizen of the Nation to-day. It was sound, and should have become also the opinion of the Supreme Court.

SOME CRITICS OF THE COURTS

We are told not to criticize the courts, and we should not, unless we do it in the way it was done by such a dangerous man as Thomas Jefferson, who pointed his finger at John Marshall, the then presiding Chief Justice, and said:

> There sits the man who, by his twistifications of acts of Congress, is going to take away from the people their liberties.

And there were other dangerous men.

The next man who proved to be a critic of the Supreme Court was none other than "fighting" Andrew Jackson. He said of the same Marshall:

> He has written an opinion, but to enforce it, it takes the militia. I have charge of the militia. Let's see John Marshall get the militia to enforce his decision.

And then another dangerous man came along who had the hardihood to criticize the court. His name was Abraham Lincoln. He said:

> Better that we destroy that court—

Referring to its decision in the Dred Scott Case—> than for that court to destroy this Republic.

And then a little later two more dangerous men arose to offer some criticism of the courts.

One of them was a very impulsive man who, in 1912, one year after the Supreme Court rendered its trust decision, went into the State of Ohio and made a speech, and on that occasion he criticized the tendency of the courts to interfere with the rights of the people. He said:

> There are certain decisions in which the people should have a voice even after the decision is rendered. There are private suits between litigants that the effect of decision therein is to interfere with rights of the people as a whole; therefore, the people should have some voice in approval or disapproval of such decision.

He also added on that occasion:

> Opportunity should be preserved to the American boy, just as his father and his grandfather had before him.

That was Teddy. Theodore Roosevelt was running for the Republican nomination for President, and up to the day he made that speech he looked like a winner but after he made it, big business saw to it that the nomination went to Mr. Taft. They preferred defeat with Taft rather than victory with Roosevelt with such doctrines as these in his mind.

A short time ago, in the city of Cleveland, there was a meeting. It was the World's Alliance of Young Men's Christian Associations, and at this meeting was voiced the protest of youth against conditions that were fast closing the doors of opportunity.

> In particular the World's Alliance urges that immediately further steps be taken by governments and leaders of commerce and industry to give youth opportunity to gain a livelihood until economic stability is restored.

That resolution was passed at that meeting. I wonder if these young Christian gentlemen who met over there and passed that resolution had any realization of what happened to Theodore Roosevelt when he got in the way of big business and demanded opportunity for the boy of his day, expressing the wish that he should have the same opportunity that his father and his grandfather had?

Dealing with this word "opportunity" at this moment, let me just say that there is no liberty unless there is opportunity. If we are, nominally, free but with no opportunity to make a living, then there is no liberty, and Roosevelt and the Young Men's Christian Association were both right in demanding that the youth of to-day have such equal opportunity as may accord them at least a chance to obtain a job or embark in a better business which will assure them a fair living and the right of a competency for their families.

BRYAN A GREAT JEFFERSONIAN

The next man who appeared in the limelight as indicting the courts was William J. Bryan. In the same year, 1912, a year after this Standard Oil decision of the Supreme Court was rendered, he said:

> There sits at the White House the man who has packed the courts in the interests of the trust—meaning Mr. Taft. Mr. Taft said on that occasion that he would not dignify Mr. Bryan with an answer. Mr. Bryan was right. He did not believe Mr. Taft was personally dishonest; he did not believe that he would take money; but he did know that Taft was a Hamiltonian, that Taft was not a Jeffersonian, or a believer, like Jefferson, in the rights of the people.

Taft believed as a loyal Hamiltonian that it was the duty of government "to write laws to please the rich, to enlist the rich, and to additionally enrich the rich." Therefore the little fellow in trade met disaster from those statesmen who followed the theories of Alexander Hamilton.

William J. Bryan tried hard to revive the doctrines of Jefferson, and in his preachment of these doctrines he urged the things that would have resulted in good for the little fellow in trade. Bryan's greatest speech was not his "Cross of Gold" speech, but his speech on the trust question in 1900 in Chicago at a gathering of those for and against the trusts, in which he said this:

> I am opposed to any plan which places the dollar on a pedestal and man under the dollar. The dollar was made for the use of man, and not man for the use of the dollar. This is a debasement of mankind.

He then went on to describe the contest ahead of us as a contest between two men: The God-made man and the man-made man. The God-made man was a man who was brought into the world with a heart and a soul; he was only permitted to remain here a short time, 60 or 70 years, not long enough to do much harm; in the God-made man, the biggest was not much bigger than the smallest, the strongest not much stronger than the weakest. Then man made a man, and that man was given a life in perpetuity. This man-made man was not made of equal strength with the God-made-man; but given a strength, yes, one thousand or one million times greater. This man-made man had neither a heart nor a soul.

The God-made man, said Bryan, had a soul that he might be punished in the world to come for misdeeds; there was no punishment for the man-made man unless it was on this earth. The man-made man can be found in the form of a corporation that is at the back of every trust in the United States. Man was the creator of this man; he could regulate it. And, let me add, that if need be, he can put it out of existence if its continuance means the destruction of the happiness of the God-made man. This was Bryan's greatest speech.

He was preaching simply the doctrine of Jefferson when he gave this great utterance, but for some reason or other there was not an American response. The people preferred those who were preaching the Hamilton doctrine. They followed the Hamiltonian teachers of that day, and disaster has followed quickly in the wake of this Hamiltonian decision of the Supreme Court written by Hamiltonian judges appointed by a Hamiltonian President. The Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co. were taken care of, and the thousands of other trusts which have waxed fat on the nourishment of that decision are no small contributing factors to the depression in which this country is sunk to-day.

Let us not forget that the Hamilton believers are working all the while. I have here a copy of the Saturday Evening Post, in which the sage of Northampton, Mass., Calvin Coolidge, takes his pen in hand—I think he gets $3 a word for these effusions that appear from time to time. Being thrifty and diligent, like all New Englanders, he gives little for nothing. Mr. Coolidge, in his articles, proceeds to give real Hamiltonian doctrine to the Post readers—the plain, old-fashioned Vermont garden variety.

COOLIDGE ON LEADERSHIP

He says in this article:

> It is natural and inevitable that the people would wish to see their authority repose in some public officer and translated into positive action for their relief and protection. More and more they have come to look to the Executive Office for leadership.

That is typical Hamiltonian doctrine, "look to the Executive Office for leadership." The people's representatives in Congress do not count. Then he says:

> The ordinary voters can not give the time and attention necessary to solve the intricate and complicated problems of modern government. They have to be engaged in earning their livelihood; the natural rule of division of labor requires them to delegate governmental duties to expert officers.

"Delegated to expert officers." You know the ones he means.

First, I take issue with him when he says that the people have not time to give attention to the problems which concern them or that they are too busily engaged making a living to give thought to these complicated questions of government. When Mr. Hoover took his seat more than three-fourths of American employees and little merchants sat down with him, and they have not gotten up yet. They have had plenty of time to think of these complicated questions of government. The trouble with the American people is they have trusted too much to the Hamiltonians of the Coolidge-Hoover type, and the leadership has been a false leadership, a leadership of property and not of humanity.

I listened to Mr. Coolidge over the radio some time ago. He was crying out that he wanted the people to buy insurance, that he was a director in the New York Life Insurance Co. himself, and that he could recommend insurance as a good investment. I could not believe the evidence of my own ears, that an ex-President of the United States would lend his prestige to the selling of life insurance. I could not help but think that perhaps if he had lived in an earlier day, he would have been selling lightning rods or sewing machines, because many New Englanders engaged in those two occupations. But when I thought that this man, in this period of distress, was urging others to buy—he who was so thrifty, and who had received $75,000 a year as President of the United States and saved most of it—and when I remembered it was said that when he decided to move back to Northampton he used Government trucks to haul his household effects, I was no longer surprised that he had left the Presidency to peddle life insurance and tell the people, at $3 per word, the kind of leaders they ought to follow.

When the great War between the States closed and President Grant was installed, he met George Pickett, of the famous Pickett brigade of the Southern Army, and he said, "Pickett, I am going to make you marshal of Virginia." Pickett was, oh, so poor, and he said, "Why, Mr. President, you can't do that." "Yes; I can." "No, no; you can't. There are two reasons. First, you can't afford to do it; and, second, I can't afford to take it." And then the President, in his brusque way, demanded, "Who in the hell told you I couldn't afford to do it?" "Maybe you can, Mr. President, maybe so; but the second reason stands. I couldn't afford to take it at your hands." This in no way detracts from the magnanimity of Grant in tendering it. Grant saw it in the light that he wanted to help Pickett, but Pickett could not bring himself to accept anything at the hands of President Grant lest those whom he had led such a short time before, many of them to death, all of them to poverty, might disapprove of his accepting something at the hands of one who had led the forces of the opposition. That was Pickett's idea of prestige and honor.

The same State furnished a great leader, the commander of the armies of the South. After the war the New York Life Insurance Co., later the employer of Calvin Coolidge, said to Gen. Robert E. Lee, "We want you as our president," and tendered him the magnificant salary of $50,000 a year. And then this great man said in reply: "I am not an insurance man. I know nothing about the insurance business. Therefore, if I accepted this place, it might be considered that I was bartering away my people or my name. This can't be done." Lee declined it. He accepted instead the presidency of the Washington and Lee University, of Lexington, Va., at a salary of $1,500 a year. No Vermonter of the Coolidge kind could understand this, but it was a great example of real leadership, without thought of the dollar.

JEFFERSON REFUSED GIFTS AND EMOLUMENTS

When Thomas Jefferson was President, he protested against the presentation of gifts to him while holding that office. First the question came up in the presentation of merely "a bust of the Emperor of Russia." When this presentation was made he had to accept it diplomatically, but a little later a cane was tendered him, and he declined it. In his declination he said that the President of the United States should receive a gift of no kind from any source, unless it be a pamphlet or a book, and he should receive no compensation or remuneration of any kind outside of his salary. He carried this principle out even on his retirement into private life, refusing employment of any kind that carried with it compensation, lest it be said of him that he was selling the prestige of that office. I would respectfully suggest to the sage of Northampton that he should substitute the Virginia ideals of leadership for the Vermont idea of getting while the getting is good.

Let me remark, as I am about to conclude, that I recently read in a newspaper of Hoover proclivities an article which expressed a concern for the Democratic Party often voiced by those who support the enemy. This paper was worried about whether the Democratic Party was a wet, a dry, or a moist democracy.

A PARTY OF FREEDOM OF OPINION

That we have wet Members, dry Members, and those who are merely moist, is evident. I know we are a national party, and as such we are bound to have supporters of all shades of belief on this question. The same is true of the other party.

But what is sinful in us is never sinful in the party of Hamilton. The downright truth of it is that the one party that is always held responsible for its shortcomings is the Democratic Party. The other party, with its high collar, its stovepipe hat, its Prince Albert coat, and its hands folded in prayerful attitude, is always above reproach. I guess that must be because it has the "grace" that "abounds for the chief of sinners."

But, my friends, let us not be misled by the things that are said by the Republican press or the Republican leaders. Be as big and as broad on this question as was John Sharp Williams, of Mississippi, when asked the question, "Are you for Al Smith for President?" "I certainly am." "But, Mr. Williams, you are dry." "Yes, I am dry; but the principles of Thomas Jefferson are greater than any sumptuary or church question that may arise."

Now, a word about Jefferson and the liquor question. He would not use hard liquor even as a prescribed remedy lest it would lead to evil habits. However, at every meal served on his table there was a bottle of wine. His practice on this question was one of both caution and tolerance.

I know that many Republicans are sincere in passing on questions of government. But they do not let their sincerity go far enough. I think they should go as far, when they are being misled, as did the old gentleman a short time ago in a church gathering just outside of Osceola, Mo. On that occasion—it was during the presidential election—the preacher, just before the close of the service, said to his congregation, "I intend to talk to you plainly to-night. I am going to give you a good talk on politics. I am going to talk concerning Alcohol Smith." Just then an elderly gentleman—a seasoned-in-the-wood Democrat—stood up in the back of the church and said, "Hold on, Brother; hold on. Now, if you are going to make a political speech, I want to make one, and I want to make mine first. When the revivalists came into this section and held their meetings, they told me if I would give up liquor, give up swearing, give up gambling, I might be saved; and now if you are going to impose a new condition, that I have to vote the Republican ticket, I'll be damned first."

In conclusion, I say to the gentlemen on the other side of the House, if you are to have a leadership, let it not be that of the big rich. And if you will not tolerate as liberal a one as that furnished by your party in Nebraska and Wisconsin, then let it be as conservative as that of George Hoar or John Sherman, who fought that the little fellow in trade might be saved against the encroachment of big combinations of wealth.

Mr. SCHAFER. And Tammany, too?

Mr. SHANNON. Is this the gentleman who deserted La Follette?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. SHANNON. Then he deserted one of the greatest democrats that ever lived. My only regret is that La Follette was in the Republican Party, because he did not belong there with such fellows as that in it. [Applause.]

If this can not be, then you should go as far as did the old gentleman who broke up the church meeting, and let the Republican Party be damned first. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, it is my purpose to make some comments concerning the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEENEY] which he made last Friday. Since my colleague was just recently elected I had not had the opportunity and pleasure of meeting him until last Monday when I went to his office to invite him to become a member of the Ohio Society, and in conversation I advised him I would probably make some observations concerning his address. I found him courteous, and well he might be, for he succeeded one of the most friendly and affable gentlemen who has served in this House, the late Hon. Charles A. Mooney, who, unlike his successor, always spoke a good word for his colleagues and the House. My new colleague from Ohio comes from the metropolis of my State, from the great city of Cleveland, which has had a marvelous growth and development in the last several years.

I hasten to advise my colleague that he did not offend me personally in what I regard as unfair and unwarranted statements, but I am only offended when I think he offends against the truth.

We have become somewhat accustomed to these attacks from the outside, but rarely do we have exhibitions of this kind from our membership and especially from one who has had such limited opportunity to observe.

Of course, it is the pastime of some to try to play on what is a popular chord in the public mind and criticize everything and everybody.

It seems to me unfortunate that the gentleman from Ohio should begin his service in the Congress by making this attack on Congress and the President at a time when government is difficult. Those of us who have had some experience here have frequently observed that when a class or group in this country does not get from the Congress what it wants or is required to do something it does not want to do it attempts to discredit Congress. Evidently the gentleman from Ohio is trying to follow this policy—being a bitter foe of prohibition himself he is trying to discredit prohibition by discrediting the Congress, through which the eighteenth amendment was submitted to the various States. [Applause.] The gentleman appears to be so much more interested in this one subject than in his colleagues and the Congress that after only five days' service he will assume to pass judgment upon the conduct of the Congress and his colleagues.

Frankly, it seems to me we have a right to expect more consideration and a somewhat judicial temperament from one who has been honored as a municipal judge by the great city of Cleveland.

Our new friend said:

> My friend from Ohio [Mr. COOPER], who preceded me, is an ardent dry, a sincere dry. I pay tribute to his sincerity. He is not that type of a dry who goes to the wash room, takes a drink of liquor, and then comes back on the floor and votes dry. He is honest. There are a few of that type left. He said that prohibition was one of the important questions before the American public.

The tribute he pays to my colleague from Ohio as to his character and sincerity is amply deserved, but the charges, insinuations, and innuendoes as to the membership of the House are unwarranted and untrue. Our new colleague plays the rôle of a modern Diogenes looking for an honest man and after only being a Member of this House for five days he makes these untrue inferences. As I said, I have been a Member of this House for 13 years, and during that time I have never seen a Member of the Congress or anyone else take a drink of liquor in the washroom, the cloakroom, or any place in this House. [Applause.] I have talked to employees of the House, and they have made the same observations that I made that this does not exist. The fact is, during my service of 13 years I could count on the fingers of one hand all the Members of Congress that I have ever seen under the influence of liquor.

Speaking in the large, the membership of this House observe the laws, support the laws, and try to assist those who are having a difficult time in administering them. Contrast that attitude with the untrue and unfortunate utterances of my colleague, who evidently is swayed by the propaganda that would discredit our membership and demoralize government itself.

But we forget, yet we should not forget. I would cast no reflection upon the Members of this House who served in other years. They served their day and generation well, like we are trying to do. However, I speak about a condition. It is a well-known fact, although some forget it, that in this Capitol there used to be a bar, where liquor was dispensed and which Members of the Congress patronized. I have talked with men who served in the Congress then and who have served now, and I have never found one who is in a position to observe but what said there is much less drinking now than there was then.

The gentleman from Ohio alleges that two Members of Congress were discussing the bad quality of Washington liquor. I really feared my friend was going to qualify as a "snooper," but he hastened to say that he was not a Smedley Butler, and yet he did something that I think is infinitely worse. "Oh," he hastens to say, "I will not tell you their names." He refuses to tell the names of two Members, thereby putting odium and a cloud upon the entire membership of the House. I think that is indefensible. If I talked recklessly and extravagantly like the gentleman from Ohio, I would say more.

And then the gentleman speaks of hypocrisy. I charge no one in this House with hypocrisy, not even the gentleman who has spoken these words. I leave each Member to his individual judgment and conscience when he votes. But, since the gentleman raises this question, I am wondering how, having been a municipal judge and how, having five days ago, with all of us, taken the oath to support and uphold the Constitution of the United States, he squares his attitude by attacking the Constitution in his first utterance in this House. He would attack the man and call him a hypocrite who happens to take a drink of liquor, a thing which I do not do or defend, but who supports the Constitution and does what he can to enforce the law. Our colleague appears to feel that his attitude or privilege is to take an oath to support and uphold the Constitution but thereafter he would not be hypocritical if he would drink, talk against the Constitution, embarrass those who are trying to enforce it, and put every obstacle in the way of its success. [Applause.]

Apparently, from his attitude, that would be what he thinks a Representative should or could do with propriety. The unwarranted statement of the gentleman is unfortunate, to say the least, and his attitude makes difficult the work of those who are honestly trying to enforce the laws.

Then, the gentleman says:

> I hope there is courage here, and I hope there is no group that will control anybody.

Allow me to say I share that hope.

Now, keeping in mind the gentleman comes from a great city, he demonstrates his unusual courage by attacking the Anti-Saloon League and charging us with being subservient. I marveled at his ability to observe, but I have marveled more at his courage in this respect. Do you suppose it could be possible the gentleman is thinking about his own subserviency to some organization?

He not only lectures Congress but he criticizes the President. He states:

> I am also concerned with the attitude of the President of the United States. I am surprised that he has made no mention of this question of prohibition.

My colleague criticizes the President for not saying anything, but I feel absolutely sure that he would have criticized what the President would say if he were speaking on this subject. The President's position on this matter is clear, and he does not have to keep continually talking about it to satisfy the gentleman from Ohio. But he says where is the statesmanship, where is the leadership, and then he wonders what Al Smith would have done. Many times I have wondered the same thing. My friend did not tell me what Al Smith would have done, and I can only leave you wondering and wondering. The American people decided between Herbert Hoover and Al Smith. Few of our Presidents have had to serve in more difficult times than President Hoover. I feel confident the thoughtful people of this country are behind President Hoover in his efforts to serve the country in his great office. Fortunately we have a world figure when we have world problems. The President has maintained our prestige abroad and carefully, honestly, and efficiently administered our affairs at home. We will do well to support him rather than be a party to destructive criticism like that in which my new colleague has indulged. [Applause.]

I have said these few words because I have tired of these unwarranted and gratuitous aspersions upon the membership of this House. In the words of my friend I have intended no personal offense. I want with you to maintain the dignity, decorum, and good name of this House and its membership.

> Good name, in man and woman, dear my lord,
> Is the immediate jewel of their souls,
> Who steals my purse, steals trash,
> 'Tis something, nothing,
> 'Twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands,
> But he that filches from me my good name
> Robs me of that which not enriches him,
> And makes me poor indeed.

[Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEENEY].

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I did not hear all my colleague from Ohio told you with reference to the speech I made the other day. I want to say right now that I am making no apology for the statements I made in the House last Friday. I appreciate that it is no reflection on the sincere Members of Congress who are here trying to do their duty. But, if it fits those who are hypocrites, I am making no apology.

I did not base my remarks on observations made the last four or five days. I have been coming to this Capitol since prohibition became a part of the organic law of the Nation. I have heard discussions on both sides of this mighty question. I have been in the offices and I have made observations around the cloakrooms, and, as I said, I am not making any apology.

I saw the lash wielded by Wayne B. Wheeler in the Ohio Legislature. I saw men come into the legislature drunk, who had almost to be literally carried out to the cloakroom after registering their affirmative vote on dry legislation. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER], who is honest, perhaps knows of the conditions of which I speak, for I was with him there in 1913 and 1914.

I am charged with being presumptious in getting up here and presenting my views after a service of only five days.

But I am trying to cure the condition brought about by prohibition; a condition that caused by Government agents the murder of a man like Mr. Hansen, secretary of the Elks, who was killed at Niagara Falls, N. Y., three years ago. I am trying to stop the shooting, in bootleg warfare, of United States Senators in the public streets of Washington. I am trying to cure a condition responsible for laws such as "a life for a pint law," which they had in the State of Michigan, and where they sentenced to prison the mother of small children for having in her possession a few ounces of spirits. I am trying to cure conditions existing in Ohio, where, for instance, a jurist gave a dry agent a fine of $5 and costs for shooting an innocent English girl, visiting relatives in our State, who was riding in an auto. The next case on the docket of this jurist, who, by the way, was a leader in the Anti-Saloon League forces, was, so I am informed, a poor foreigner, and he was fined $1,000 and costs for having a barrel of grape juice in his basement, which nature, through her operation, raised in alcoholic content to an excess of one-half of 1 per cent. These are the things I am thinking about.

I want to be fair with all of you Members, and especially with my colleagues from Ohio who disagree with me on this question, but I maintain that the political Anti-Saloon League and its allies have set the cause of temperance back a half century. Temperance, I believe, is a virtue. Prohibition, in my opinion, is a vice. The question of temperance and morals is one for the church and the school and the home, and has no place in the legislative halls of the Nation.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield to another gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY], who has been here longer than five days.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I am from Ohio. I am proud of my State, and this is the first time that I have ever heard anyone who comes from my State accuse the legislators of that State of being drunkards. I resent it. I am ashamed of it, and I am ashamed of a 5-day Member who comes and misrepresents the men who have been elected by the people of my State to represent them in the halls where laws are made. I want him to name them. I do not know this gentleman; I have not met him as yet. I do not know that he will want to meet me, because his views and mine on this question are as far apart as the poles; but I do resent that kind of loose talk about the legislators of my State, regardless of their political faith. If I wanted to be in the same frame of mind that he assumes, I might call the gentleman's attention to the fact that it was on his side of the aisle that he heard the liquor question discussed by those——

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. No; I can not yield—discussed by those who complained about the kind of liquor that was being sold in Washington.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MURPHY. No; I can not yield now; I am sorry. I do not want to be discourteous. This is a time when such questions as the one discussed by the gentleman ought to be relegated to the rear, and we should be occupying our time in taking cognizance of the terrible economic conditions existing not only in our own country but throughout the entire world. We ought to be thankful to-day that we have in the White House the great courageous statesman who is there seeking to do the best he can with what he has, where he is, for the benefit of all of the people, Democrat and Republican alike. [Applause on the Republican side.] This is no time to bring forward the wet and dry issue. I do not want to talk on that question, but when a man from my State insults the legislators of my State, as he insulted this House each time he has spoken, it is time for me to become vocal. I hope that you boys up in the press gallery will send the story back to Ohio that we are not cowards here, that we are not afraid to speak out, that we stand for a clean Government, that we stand for clean legislators, and that we are clean men and clean women here. Nor are we drunkards, seeking a chance to sneak a drink. I resent it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that my colleagues will pardon me for taking this extra minute to-day. I rise to call attention to the fact that this body, during the debate on these important bills, is being presided over by our distinguished colleague from South Carolina [Mr. MCMILLAN]. It so happens that 15 years ago to-day our friend brought his bride here to Washington on their honeymoon. [Applause.] They sat in this gallery watching the proceedings, and he became so much impressed with the deliberations of this body, its dignity, and its honor that he wanted to associate with us. A few years later he came here to represent his State. He is peculiarly fitted to preside over this House. For four years he presided as speaker over the legislative body of his own State, with dignity and ability. It so happens now that in passing these bills under his guidance we are passing some of the best legislation that we have had before this House for many years. I congratulate my friends and the State of South Carolina on producing such a worthy presiding officer. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hopes the committee will pardon him for expressing his appreciation to Mr. BLANTON for his remarks.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, this is one question on which the Republicans join with my friend from Texas. If there are no others who desire to speak, I ask that the bill be read under the 5-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, subject to the exemptions, conditions, and limitations hereinafter prescribed, there is hereby imposed upon transfers of net estates of decedents a tax at the rate prescribed in section 8 of this act.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCMILLAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 5822 and had come to no resolution thereon.

REGENTS, SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following, which the Clerk read:

Pursuant to the provisions of title 20, section 43, United States Code, the Chair appoints as Regents of the Smithsonian Institute the following Members of the House of Representatives: Mr. MONTAGUE, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, Mr. JOHNSON of Washington.

CONTESTED ELECTION CASE, BALL v. VESTAL

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Elections No. 1 and ordered printed:

DECEMBER 7, 1931.

The SPEAKER HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

SIR: The contest for the seat in the House of Representatives from the eighth district of Indiana was instituted by Claude C. Ball against the returned Member, A. H. Vestal, pursuant to the provisions of the act of March 2, 1887, as evidenced by the filing in the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives of a notice of contest and of the reply thereto by the contestee.

It does not appear that testimony was adduced during the time prescribed by law, and apparently, therefore, the contest is abated. The papers filed in this office will be transmitted to that Committee on Elections to which the case shall be referred.

Very respectfully,

WM. TYLER PAGE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—O'CONNOR v. DISNEY

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Elections No. 2, and ordered printed:

DECEMBER 7, 1931.

The SPEAKER HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to lay before the House of Representatives the contest for the seat in the House of Representatives for the Seventy-second Congress of the United States for the first district of the State of Oklahoma, Charles O'Connor v. Wesley E. Disney, notice of which has been filed in the office of the Clerk of the House; and also transmit herewith original testimony, papers, and documents relating thereto.

In compliance with the act approved March 2, 1887, entitled "An act relating to contested-election cases," and such portions of the testimony as the parties in interest agreed upon or as seemed proper to the Clerk, after giving the requisite notices, have been printed and indexed, together with the notices of contest, and the answers thereto and original papers and exhibits have been sealed up and are ready to be laid before the Committee on Elections.

Two copies of the printed testimony in the aforesaid case have been mailed to the contestant and the same number to the contestee, which, together with an abstract thereof and copies of the briefs of the parties, will be laid before the Committee on Elections to which the case shall be referred.

Yours respectfully,

WM. TYLER PAGE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

CONTESTED ELECTION, EVERETT KENT v. WILLIAM R. COYLE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following further communication, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Elections No. 1 and ordered printed.

DECEMBER 7, 1931.

The SPEAKER HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to lay before the House of Representatives the contest for a seat in the House of Representatives for the Seventy-second Congress of the United States for the thirtieth district of the State of Pennsylvania, Everett Kent v. William R. Coyle, notice of which has been filed in the office of the Clerk of the House; and also transmit herewith original testimony, papers, and documents relating thereto.

In compliance with the act approved March 2, 1887, entitled "An act relating to contested-election cases," the Clerk has opened and printed the testimony in the above case, and such portions of the testimony as the parties in interest agreed upon or as seemed proper to the Clerk, after giving the requisite notices, have been printed and indexed, together with the notices of contest, and the answers thereto and original papers and exhibits have been sealed up and are ready to be laid before the Committee on Elections.

Two copies of the printed testimony in the aforesaid case have been mailed to the contestant and the same number to the contestee, which, together with an abstract thereof and copies of the briefs of the parties, will be laid before the Committee on Elections to which the case shall be referred.

Yours respectfully,

WILLIAM TYLER PAGE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF STANLEY H. KUNZ v. PETER C. GRANATA

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following further communication, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Elections No. 3 and ordered printed.

DECEMBER 7, 1931.

The SPEAKER HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to lay before the House of Representatives the contest for a seat in the House of Representatives for the Seventy-second Congress of the United States for the eighth district of the State of Illinois, Stanley H. Kunz v. Peter C. Granata, notice of which has been filed in the office of the Clerk of the House; and also transmit herewith original testimony, papers, and documents relating thereto.

In compliance with the act approved March 2, 1887, entitled "An act relating to contested-election cases," and such portions of the testimony as the parties in interest agreed upon or as seemed proper to the Clerk, after giving the requisite notices, have been printed and indexed, together with the notices of contest, and the answers thereto and original papers and exhibits have been sealed up and are ready to be laid before the Committee on Elections.

Two copies of the printed testimony in the aforesaid case have been mailed to the contestant and the same number to the contestee, which, together with an abstract thereof and copies of the briefs of the parties, will be laid before the Committee on Elections to which the case shall be referred.

Yours respectfully,

WILLIAM TYLER PAGE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

BALANCE OF TRADE BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and correct my remarks by incorporating in my remarks a table which I have prepared.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ALDRICH. Ladies and gentlemen of the House, I ask permission to address the House for the purpose of inserting in the RECORD the table which I have compiled from information contained in Foreign Commerce and Navigation, a publication issued by the Department of Commerce, which shows the balance of trade between the United States and those countries which are named in the moratorium agreement, in so far as the balance of trade is indicated by the exports from the United States to those countries, and imports from those countries into the United States.

I call attention to the fact that with Poland I have included Danzig, and with Yugoslavia I have included Albania, because that is the way they are reported by the Department of Commerce.

I also want particularly to call the attention of the Members of the House to the enormous purchases made by those countries from the United States in the year 1930, after the depression started. In that year alone they purchased $1,418,745,000 worth of merchandise from the United States.

The table referred to is as follows:

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] whether we will take up the moratorium resolution to-morrow.

Mr. RAINEY. The hearings on the resolution have not been completed, and I presume we will go ahead with the bills relating to the District of Columbia to-morrow.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman presume we may get the moratorium resolution later in the afternoon, or will it go over until Friday?

Mr. RAINEY. I doubt whether we will be able to get it up to-morrow. I think it will likely go over until Friday.

Mr. SNELL. Then we will go along with the regular work in connection with the bills affecting the District of Columbia?

Mr. RAINEY. That is the intention.

Mr. ABERNETHY. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?

Mr. RAINEY. Certainly.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Does the gentleman think we will vote on the moratorium resolution this week or not?

Mr. RAINEY. We hope to vote on the resolution before Saturday night.

Mr. ABERNETHY. There is no certainty about it, however?

Mr. RAINEY. There is no certainty about it.

LEGISLATION

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I am so anxious for this Congress to pass some real legislation during the next few months. We are passing through a depression such as we have never witnessed before. I am hoping for us to get through with as little real suffering as is humanly possible. I feel though, that if we are to again enjoy real prosperity, we must quit some of the things that we are now doing and bring about a new dawn of real freedom.

We must enact some real farm relief legislation, such as I have from time to time discussed. We must return to the people the right to determine their own affairs and save the independent farmer, laboring man, and individual citizen. Entirely too much of our legislation is for the interest of selfish groups, and not for the best interest of the common people and the Nation as a whole. There has been entirely too much concentration of political and financial power. Too often legislation intended for the best interest of the whole people is finally seized by a few and used to crush the very people whom it was intended to help.

Shrewd politicians and lawyers too often watch the passage of bills and finally succeed in getting the bills in such shape as to be easily captured by them and used by them to create enormous salaries and destroy the very people whom the act was originally intended to help.

I should not make this kind of a statement unless I am willing to name some pieces of legislation which I honestly believe is subject to this criticism. I am prepared to name some of such legislation, and would be very happy if I could be convinced that I am mistaken.

Generally, I may say that all bills which have created large bureaus and granted authority to a small group of men to dominate the rights and very liberties of the people are dangerous in the extreme.

The regional banking system is certainly in this very class. A few years ago we heard it said on every side that with the regional banking system our country was panic proof. Well, we are having the worst depression this country ever saw. All the small banks are disappearing and now chain banking and branch banking is being openly advocated with the purpose of bringing about a complete banking monopoly. There are those who advocate a system which will mean that there will be only one or two large banks in the country operating by branches wherever they may choose, without anyone else having the right to open up a bank in opposition to them. This can only mean a further concentration of political and financial power. With such a system one or two men in Wall Street can name the President of the United States, the Members of Congress and all other officials of the States and Nation.

All kind of gigantic trusts and mergers are now being openly advocated to the destruction of the liberties of the people. Are we soon to have chain farming, and chain banking, and every other kind of a monopoly that means the oppression of the people, the ultimate destruction of our liberties, and the final downfall of the Nation?

Let me mention another illustration of what I am saying. The Federal farm loan act was intended as an agent of mercy for the farmers of the country and has become an agent of torture and destruction. The farmers would have been in infinitely better shape if this act had never been passed. Communities that were intended to manage their own affairs are being ignored in everything except the burdens that have been placed upon them, and the management and salaries of the whole scheme are being enjoyed by those not in sympathy with the local communities, and who in most, if not all, instances have little or none of the burden to carry. I feel that Congress should repeal this act and turn these affairs over to some one to administer for the best interest of the farmers of the Nation.

I find that the officials in charge of this institution are cold-blooded in the extreme and seem to relish the opportunity to foreclose and sell the lands of the farmers of the country. The long-term loan companies and old-line life insurance companies are much more liberal than these people who should be the friends of the farmers. I shall do everything in my power to stop this high-handed oppression by these people holding office under an act passed in behalf of the farmers but used for selfish purposes.

In fairness to all concerned, let me say that much of the vicious practice under the farm loan act is brought about by the wording of the act itself, for which Congress is responsible. This is what I am complaining about. Congress should never pass an act under which a few men can distort the very purposes of the act and use it as an instrument of torture and death rather than a medium of service.

The Farm Board act was criticized by me before it was finally enacted into law and I then pointed out the very dangers which were in its every page and which has made it so unpopular. Many people administering these acts are anxious to be of real service to the people of the Nation, but are handicapped by the failure of Congress to pass proper basic law at the time the board or bureau is brought into existence.

Now, let me name at least one of the proposals that have been suggested to relieve the present financial depression that is filled with the very dangers that I have just been discussing. Take, for instance, the gigantic corporation that some say should be brought into existence in the name of the home owners of the Nation. If this corporation is to bring about as many foreclosures as the rural credit system has, then may God have mercy on the home owners who mortgage their homes to any concern that later transfers the lien to this powerful corporation.

Let us reason about this matter a little. This corporation is to be set up for the purpose of making salaries, commissions, fees, and other profits out of the home owners. It is true it is to be created in the name of the home owners, but the real purpose is to make money out of the home owners. Let us visualize a situation like the present, with this corporation owning thousands upon top of thousands of mortgages on homes where the larger part of the debt has been paid and the owner has a very large equity but yet because of a financial depression can not pay his interest and taxes. His obligation will have passed out of the hands of his neighbors from whom he originally borrowed the money. They can not help him if they want to. His paper is owned by a great corporation, with strangers to his interest, in charge. They see that as a money-grabbing scheme that can buy in a large amount of very valuable property at about one-fourth of its value. They hold in the hollow of their hands the power to destroy thousands of home owners and grab their property for practically nothing. Does anyone doubt what will be done? Again I am pleading with the Members of Congress to stop passing bills creating the power to destroy thousands of our people by the decision of a few men.

The real cause of the present depression is very evident to my mind. A few money-mad men have the power in their hands to slaughter our people for the sole and only purpose of enriching themselves and are madly and selfishly exercising the power to the destruction of our very Nation.

I shall discuss this matter much more a little later. For the present I shall make a few more observations and conclude. I really want some matters to develop just a little more before I go more into detail.

Let us pass some real legislation for the common people. Let us pass some legislation for the home owners of the country and for the farmers of the Nation. I will tell you how to do it.

Help pass and bring into effect a Federal constitutional amendment which I have been advocating for years, giving the head of each family the constitutional right to own, for home purposes, free of all taxes, $5,000 worth of property. This would force the municipalities, counties, States, and Nation to raise all taxes from sources other than the homes of the small-home owners. This would help get the farmers back on the farms. It would do more to relieve the present distressed condition of the home owner than any other plan yet proposed. Nothing I have ever heard suggested would do so much to bring about a Nation of happy, contented, prosperous citizens.

I fear though that I shall not get very far with this proposal. There is not enough centralization of power and big salaries to make the bill popular. Too many can see that the plan would cost the big rich a little money, and no one would be able under the scheme to exploit the masses of the people.

I shall not only fight for this proposal, but I shall fight to secure for the original owners the return of the lands that are now being taken over by the Federal farm-loan concerns and other long-term loan companies.

I have introduced a bill for this purpose and am determined to pass it if humanly possible.

In conclusion, let me say the problems before this Congress are more serious and more numerous than ever before, and it is our solemn duty to not only relieve the present awful condition but return the liberties of the people to the masses and help this Nation of ours to again become and remain a "Government of the people for the people and by the people."

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on Philippine independence.

The SPEAKER. The Delegate from the Philippine Islands asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Speaker, this is a brief presentation of the crux of the American-Philippine problem and there is no need of any preliminary or periphrasis. My thesis is clear. America must grant immediate Philippine independence.

I. GROUNDS FOR THE GRANT OF INDEPENDENCE

There are two fundamental reasons why the people and Government of the United States should grant independence to the Philippine Islands without delay.

In the first place this is the avowed Philippine policy of America. It is the mission she set out for herself at the inception of America's Philippine occupation. It is a sacred pledge made and oft reiterated by Presidents of the United States, by Governors General, by the major political parties, and in Congressional enactment.

In the second place, the early grant of independence is what the Philippine Legislature and the Filipino people most desire. Both political parties in the islands are committed to it. All live elements long for it. There is no people in the history of the world that has ever been as united for national independence as the Filipinos.

II. PROLONGED OCCUPATION DISADVANTAGEOUS

America must grant immediate Philippine independence because the prolonged occupation of the islands is disadvantageous to both the Americans and the Filipinos.

I will enumerate some of the most important disadvantages to the United States first:

First. The indefinite retention of the Philippine Islands is leading peoples, especially in the Orient, to wonder whether the United States, after all, is really different from colonizing countries of imperialistic designs. This is not surprising when anti-imperialism itself was an issue in American politics soon after America took possession of the islands. This is also not an unnatural feeling among peoples inhabiting countries that have been the victims of economic and political imperialism in the history of colonization.

Second. The continued occupation of the Philippines also tends to breed doubt and suspicion and misunderstanding. True, the Filipinos have, throughout the years of cooperation with the Americans, demonstrated faith, hope, and confidence in view of America's announced policy to make her administration of our country only temporary. It would be unfortunate for this country itself to permit a situation to develop which would mar the harmony that has heretofore prevailed.

Third. The failure to grant Philippine independence after repeated and categorical promises made is unjustly submitting America to charges of insincerity in her altruistic protestations, and of violation of certain fundamental principles upon which the American Government rests. Among these are the principle of a government based upon the consent of the governed, that of self-determination, that of the right of nations great and small to liberty and self-government, and that of democratic government founded upon a constitution.

Fourth. It is foreign to American political philosophy to permit the imposition of a civilization of a materialistic type which may prove destructive to Philippine social organization.

Fifth. The withholding of independence to the Philippines is unwholesome to the United States because it is apt to lead people to think that the point of view of the rulers or colonizers is the standard of right, and that the point of view of those living in a dependency must necessarily be wrong.

Sixth. The people of this country should realize also the danger of weakening our people's resistance to corroding influences from without. There is this constant menace arising from the pressure of the influence and the power of every ruling country. If the United States really took possession of the Philippines to help the people, then they should be freed without delay.

Seventh. The long retention of the Philippines may also lead to a situation whereby the good in American culture and American institutions may not be readily welcomed because of the fear that they may eventually prove instruments for our dependence rather than independence.

Eighth. The continued occupation of the Philippines, despite America's traditional devotion to the principle of liberty, is a breeder, real and potential, of misunderstanding. One example will suffice: The rank and file of the people of the Philippines believe sincerely in America's Christian altruism, and yet there is even now serious agitation from certain quarters which, if carried out, would prove adverse to our interests. This is true in the case of the proposal to tax Philippine goods coming to the United States while American goods going to the Philippines are admitted free of duty and without limit. This is further aggravated by the presentation of measures designed to exclude Filipinos from the United States.

Ninth. Another disadvantage is the disillusionment on the part of the Filipinos with respect to the selection of American officials not wholly in sympathy with America's fundamental policy and the aspirations of the Filipino people.

Tenth. Still another disadvantage of retention is found in a disregard of an important political tenet, namely, that good government from without is never a proper substitute for self-government.

I shall now point out briefly some of the disadvantages of prolonged dependency to the Filipino people themselves:

First. The occupation of a country by a people of another race is always fraught with possibilities of fostering racial prejudice. The attitude of the ruler tends to develop among the people ruled a certain spirit of reserve, if not hostility.

Second. The occupation of a country on the part of another also is invariably accompanied by a constant conflict, real or potential, between the feeling of superiority complex on the one hand and inferiority complex on the other.

Third. Continued dependency tends to weaken a people's individuality.

Fourth. It is also apt to develop undesirable groups, such as hypocrites and others of their ilk, because of the temptation to ingratiate themselves among the rulers.

Fifth. Another evil is that dependency has a tendency to foster contentment at least on the part of some with their dependent lot.

Sixth. Another great disadvantage of a dependent state is the tendency to place a premium upon subserviency on the part of the colonized as a virtue.

Seventh. Prolonged dependency retards the development of originality and self-reliance.

Eighth. It also tends to weaken the national morale of a people.

Ninth. A dependent state prevents the proper development of the youth for a definite type of citizenship. This is true in the case of the Filipinos, since they can not be American citizens and have no free and self-governing country for whose citizenship they ought to be prepared.

Tenth. Prolonged dependency is iniquitous because it forces a people to be without a country.

Eleventh. Finally, prolonged dependency delays the ushering of a people into the stream of internationalism.

III. GRANT OF INDEPENDENCE MUTUALLY ADVANTAGEOUS

America must grant Philippine independence immediately, because it is advantageous to both the United States and the Philippines.

I shall present in summarized form the benefits that will accrue to the Filipino people by the grant of independence.

First. The immediate grant of Philippine independence would free the people of the islands from the benumbing effect of the present state of uncertainty.

Second. Philippine independence will bring about greater economic stability eventually. Now capital is timid because of the present indefinite political status of our country.

Third. An independent status would remove the constant dread in business circles from changes in tariff relations over which the Philippine people have no control.

Fourth. The grant of Philippine freedom will remove the constant danger of having taxes unexpectedly imposed directly or indirectly upon Philippine products. Now, it is possible for Philippine investors to suffer reverses overnight by a slight change in the tariff. Philippine industries, too, may be indirectly taxed, as illustrated by the measure amending the oleomargarine act.

Fifth. Independence will do away with the fear of having the American coastwise shipping laws extended to the Philippines, which may under the existing situation be accomplished by presidential proclamation. The Filipinos, not being eligible to American citizenship, would suffer greatly in their shipping and commerce should the coastwise shipping laws of the United States be made applicable to the Philippines.

Sixth. The establishment of an independent Philippine government will place in the hands of the Filipinos the instruments of their economic salvation. Now the Filipino people have no control over matters affecting our tariff relations, our mines, our forests, and our public domain.

Seventh. The early grant of freedom will hasten the development of greater economic-mindedness among our people. The continuation of the present uncertainty and anomaly will tend to arrest the economic development of the Philippines.

Eighth. The grant of independence will permit the Filipino people to adopt a constitution which will be better suited to their psychological and sociological nature.

Ninth. The establishment of an independent government with a constitution of our own creation will make it possible for our people to develop a more unified and scientific Philippine legal system and jurisprudence.

Tenth. With independence the Filipinos will develop greater responsibility in governmental matters. Full responsibility can be fostered only by our having complete authority.

Eleventh. From the standpoint of culture and education, independence is essential and necessary to enable the people of my country to shape an educational philosophy which is conducive to good, patriotic, and useful citizenship, because, dependent, we can not be citizens of the American Republic and can not train the Filipino youth for true Philippine citizenship, for we do not have a free self-governing country.

Twelfth. With independence we can redefine the aims and purposes of Philippine education, so as to train Filipino boys and girls to become free, efficient, and happy citizens of a country truly free and democratic.

Thirteenth. A free and independent existence will enable the Filipino people to achieve their highest development. It will furnish a new and permanent motive to our individual and social life.

Fourteenth. Independence will usher us into the modern current of internationalism. Nationalism, developed in the atmosphere of freedom, is an essential prerequisite to sound internationalism. We as a people will, when free, be in a better position to cultivate our own talent and genius and contribute in full measure to the common heritage of the world.

Fifteenth. Philippine independence will satisfy our individual desire and our national ambition and will be a powerful incentive to our putting forth our best so as to merit a place in the family of free nations.

Sixteenth. An independent Philippines will be a modern contribution to the new world order based upon the enduring foundations of peace. With freedom the Filipino people will be in a better position to exemplify the wisdom of peace and the criminality of war—peace as an attribute both human and divine and war as a grievous wrong and an enormous crime. We shall also be better qualified to occupy our allotted place in the interknit mosaic of mankind.

These, I think, are more or less self-explanatory.

I now present some of the advantages to America by granting Philippine independence at the earliest possible date.

First. America, by granting Philippine independence, would experience that joy and satisfaction which come from the fulfillment of a sacred promise.

Second. The early grant of Philippine independence will do away with the suspicion of America's high, noble, and humanitarian purposes in the Orient.

Third. It will enhance the faith of the peoples of the world in America's word.

Fourth. It will foster mutual understanding and good will.

Fifth. It will lessen distrust in American capital.

Sixth. Independence of the Philippines is considered by farmers and agricultural interests of the United States as a means of relief.

Seventh. The early grant of Philippine independence is the remedy to the growing labor unrest in the western States resulting from the influx of Filipino laborers, which can not be effectively checked or regulated as long as the Philippine Islands are under the American flag.

Eighth. It is an effective means of regulating immigration from the Philippines, for then we will be in the category of foreign countries and the islands can be placed upon a quota basis.

Ninth. Philippine independence is a means of solving one of America's growing social problems made more difficult by the factor of race differences.

Tenth. Freeing the Philippines is a way of lessening the burdens of the taxpayers of this country.

Eleventh. It will increase the confidence and friendship of the Filipinos and other orientals, and these will constitute a great moral and business asset to America in her dealings with the teeming millions in the Far East.

Twelfth. It will relieve America of the embarrassing position of recognizing ideals and principles of government at home, but which foreigners feel are not observed by the further continuation of her rule in the Philippines.

Thirteenth. Granting Philippine independence will obviate the inconsistency of America fighting in the American-Spanish War for Cuba's liberation and for the Filipinos' subjugation.

Fourteenth. It will be an effective method of enabling America to take the lead not only in the limitation but in actual reduction of armament.

Fifteenth. The early grant of Philippine independence will be a concrete contribution of America to the cause of world understanding and international peace.

Sixteenth. The establishment of a Philippine Republic will be a noble Christian act of a Christian Nation toward the only Christian people of the Orient. That, indeed, would be a most fitting climax to America's colonial experiment.

IV. PHILIPPINES READY FOR INDEPENDENCE

The Philippines are in every essential sense ready for complete independence.

First. The Filipinos are ready culturally: The people who are racially and religiously homogeneous are deeply devoted to education.

Our people had a civilization of their own before Magellan's arrival in 1521. Under Spain we received the influence of European culture. We have schools, colleges, and universities, some of which are older than the oldest in the United States. Under America we have had the benefit of her guidance and cooperation. About 30 per cent of our national budget annually is devoted to educational purposes.

The percentage of literacy in the Philippines is higher and better than that of Albania, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Bulgaria, Ceylon, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Greece, Guatemala, Guiana, Haiti, Honduras, India, Korea, Lithuania, Malay States, Mexico, Nicaragua, Palestine, Panama, Paraguay, Persia, Peru, Porto Rico, Portugal, Russia, Salvador, Siam, Spain, Syria, Turkey, Uruguay, Venezuela, and various countries of Africa and Malaysia.

Second. The Philippines are economically prepared: Our government has been self-supporting since the establishment of civil government. Our finances are sound. Our resources are ample. Under both the Spanish régime and the American administration we achieved progress.

Whatever economic dislocation may occur upon the severance of political relations will hardly be any worse than the economic disturbance bordering upon paralysis resulting from the present uncertainty of the status of the islands. The agricultural, industrial, and labor organizations of the United States demand Philippine independence for their protection. We want it for the better and eventual stabilization of Philippine industry and commerce.

We are fully conscious of the bearing of independence upon our economic life. We know the consequences and are ready to accept them. Thirteen million Filipinos with an unbroken history of struggle for freedom for centuries prize freedom more than temporary material advantage.

Fourth. The Filipino people are financially prepared for independence: The wealth of the Philippines is practically unlimited. Developed under our direction, the country can comfortably be the home of fifty or sixty million. We have been taxing ourselves to finance our activities. We shall continue to tax ourselves and finance the needs of our national life more cheerfully after the grant of independence.

The per capita indebtedness of the Philippines is one of the lowest in the world, for in 1928 it was only $5.79. This is lower than that of Argentina, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Bulgaria, Canada, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Dutch East Indies, Ecuador, Estonia, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Haiti, Hungary, India, Italy, Japan, Latvia, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Poland, Rumania, Salvador, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay, and Yugoslavia.

Fifth. Governmentally and politically we are prepared: We have had ample political experience to insure stability of our government. Before the implantation of the American flag our social organization and our governmental units had already been developed. These served as bases for later political and social organizations.

We had our short-lived Philippine Republic as the result of the Philippine revolution of 1896. It had a constitution for its basis approved by representative Filipinos in convention assembled.

To-day, after 30 years under American administration, we have all the necessary machinery of government, local, provincial, and insular.

In the central government we have six well-coordinated executive departments.

We have a bicameral legislature consisting of the senate and the house of representatives.

There is a well-organized judiciary, impartial and independent. There are justice of the peace courts, courts of first instance, and a supreme court.

We have a civil service insuring the merit system in the government service.

We have the necessary machinery for public health, sanitation, and public welfare.

We have developed roads, bridges, port works, and other public improvements. To-day there is an adequate system of communication and transportation.

We have the municipal police and the constabulary to maintain peace and order among a naturally peaceful and law-abiding people.

The whole political development has been continuous from a government of Americans during the military régime, to a government of Americans assisted by Filipinos during the first part of the civil régime, then to a government of Filipinos assisted by a few Americans during the period after the approval of the Philippine autonomy act.

The next logical step is to inaugurate a government of and by Filipinos for all the inhabitants of the Philippines through the enactment of Philippine independence legislation. This will occasion no abrupt or radical change. It is the next proper step for the people and Government of the United States to take.

6. The early grant of Philippine independence would be internationally opportune: The spirit of the age is essentially one of peace. America best knows this, because at the Washington disarmament conference she became a signatory to the treaty then approved, binding herself to an agreement not to improve the fortifications or increase the defense of the Philippines.

The League of Nations, the World Court, the Kellogg pacts, the treaty resulting from the London conference—all have come into being because the nations of the world participating definitely committed themselves to the abandonment of war as an instrument of national policy.

The Japanese bugaboo used by some imperialists and opponents of independence is unseemly, for if the United States expects her word to be accepted in good faith she must accord equal sincerity of motives to other countries signatory to peace treaties.

At any rate, the question of invulnerability has never been invoked as a prerequisite to independence.

V. INDEPENDENCE THE ONLY HONORABLE COURSE

America must grant immediate Philippine independence because it is honorable.

We the Filipino people are too appreciative of the good that America has done to want to place America in the position of serving as a prop to a people who want to stand alone and can be independent. Likewise, it is not honorable for us as a people to be compelled to lean on another when we should rely on ourselves.

It is disgraceful for an individual upon reaching maturity to continue depending upon parental support. It is to the credit of both the parent and the offspring for the latter to be self-supporting upon attaining the age of maturity. In the case of a nation, it is disgraceful continually to be in a state of dependency, and whoso is a party to forcing the continuation of such a situation has a share in the ignominy. We should be permitted as a nation to stand alone. That is the only way to stand at all.

It will be a happy day for both when Americans and Filipinos jointly shall solve their present relations on the basis of the immediate establishment of a Philippine republic, self-directed and self-supporting, absolutely free, and completely independent.

SUMMARY

America must grant immediate Philippine independence:

First. Because she has pledged it solemnly and the Filipinos desire it honorably;

Second. Because prolonged occupation of the islands is disadvantageous to the Americans and Filipinos alike;

Third. Because the grant of independence is advantageous and beneficial to both the United States and the Philippines;

Fourth. Because the Filipinos are ready for independence with all the obligations and responsibilities that go with it; and Fifth. Because the grant of Philippine independence is the only honorable course and the only just, permanent, and righteous solution of American-Filipino relations.

CAUSES AND PREVENTION OF CRIME

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD to include a reproduction of an article prepared by me and published recently in a magazine on the subject of crime.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. RAINEY. Reserving the right to object, how much space will that occupy in the RECORD?

Mr. THATCHER. It is not very long.

Mr. SNELL. It is the gentleman's own remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, under leave granted me therefor, I extend in the RECORD an article on the subject of the causes and prevention of crime, prepared by me and published in editorial form in the July, 1931, issue of the "True Detective Mysteries" magazine of New York City.

PROTECT THE HOME

[NOTE.—Never was a more timely message given to the American people than that which here follows from Hon. MAURICE H. THATCHER, elected five times in succession to the United States Congress from Kentucky. Mr. THATCHER, former member of the Isthmian Canal Commission, served several years as Governor of the Panama Canal Zone under President Taft. With the appalling crime conditions that exist in this country, this ringing appeal to fight the forces of evil and the cancer of moral irresponsibility will be welcomed everywhere by all right-thinking citizens.—Editor.]

Any discussion touching the causes and prevention of crime is more or less trite, and is also unfailingly difficult of treatment. While the tremendous toll which crime everywhere exacts is appalling, formulas for its prevention and cure have been sought ever since human accountability began, and only partial success has resulted.

The evil propensities of the human heart are so manifold, and the opportunities and temptations for wrong-doing are so universal—especially in this modern age of a million contacts—that only men and women of the highest faith, courage, and moral leadership are competent to deal with the basic problems of crime. Evil, of course, is but perverted good. How may we, in wisdom, apply our energies? This is the question of the ages.

In the limited space at my disposal I can only make brief reference to certain phases of the subject. Speaking especially of conditions in our own country, permit me to suggest an underlying cause of crime, as I am able to judge the situation. I refer to the breaking down of the home. Never before in our American history has there been such a widespread wreckage of the home and the home circle as now obtains. The home is the cornerstone of civilization, and if that cornerstone is plucked up and ceases to be, then home life with all of its intrinsically noble and inspirational features shall cease to exist—and civilization will pass away. This fact must be obvious to all, and is amply attested by tragic examples.

Marriage, which is the foundation of the home and of family life and relations, is treated as lightly, as irreverently as the most trivial feature of society. Divorces flourish in an appalling degree. Men and women pass from one matrimonial adventure to another as rapidly and as heedlessly as if life's most sacred relationship were a matter of jest and harmless experiment. As vicious as this destruction of the marriage ideal may be, its chief and most tragic evil is the horrible effect it brings upon the unoffending children of these broken homes.

Those who are unwilling to accept the legitimate responsibilities of mating have no right to assume its condition. Therefore the breaking up of the home, with its inevitable corollary of confused, neglected, and undirected boys and girls, is an outstanding cause of the commission of crime in our country. Especially is this true as regards the perpetration of crime by juvenile offenders. In this respect conditions in our own United States of America are, perhaps, without parallel in the world's history. This is an appalling fact, but it must be met in some adequate way or the Nation can not endure. If the youth of the world shall become corrupted, the progress of the race will fail.

There are many contributing causes to the destruction of the home, to the overthrow of the family altars. Parents treat their sacred obligations to each other and to their offspring lightly because their ideals are wrong.

These statements, of course, are not intended as a universal indictment of the American home and the American father and mother, but unfortunately there are enough of our fathers and mothers at fault in these matters to justify what has been stated.

Among the causes for these conditions may be mentioned the salacious screen and stage; the sensational treatment, in the press, of sex problems and relationships and crime; nonobservance of the law; a degenerate literature; and the like. The screen, the stage, the press, and literature, to the extent of their wise use, are, of course, beneficial beyond computation. Again, there is no desire to frame a universal indictment. But in the operation of all these agencies there is enough of malignancy, enough of evil and indifference to consequences, enough of a base desire, for commercial considerations, to pander to the worst instincts and emotions of the race, to justify the strongest character of presentment.

We are living in an age of material progress unequaled in all the world's history. Numberless are the instrumentalities which man has devised for his comfort, for his convenience, for his entertainment, and for his betterment. In too many cases these instrumentalities are being transformed from blessings into evils. Our ancient enemy and alibi, the Devil, ever seems to walk with us, and we must be forever on our guard against his blandishments and seductions. Our marvelous agencies for good, if not wisely used, will become the Frankenstein monsters of our destruction.

Entertainment the world needs and must have. For the various evil forms which persist beneficient forms must be substituted. The good must crowd out the bad, or the bad will crowd out the good. Wholesome sports, God's out-of-doors, a salutary press, an inspiring body of literature, a clean stage and screen, and a wise policy in dealing with crime and criminals, must play their all-important part in the scheme of betterment. The school and the church are, of course, basic in the moral and spiritual line-up. Every agency which deals with or affects the plastic mind of youth must come to recognize its influence and responsibility.

If the boys and girls of the land can be kept fine and true until their characters are molded in strength and moral purpose, the crime problem, in the largest possible measure, will diminish; for the boys and girls of to-day will become the husbands and wives and the fathers and mothers of to-morrow, the home builders of the future.

Touching the practical aspects involved in dealing with crime and criminals, only a word or two may be uttered here. Treatment of criminals can not, of course, be standardized if beneficial results are to be attained. The immature or casual offender is certainly in a different category from that of the confirmed criminal. The highest types of men and women are needed as judges, as officers of parole and probation, and as keepers and managers of our penal institutions.

Lawyers must come more and more to recognize the fact that they are, indeed, officers of the court and charged with the most solemn responsibility by reason of that fact; and that if they employ their talents, abilities, and experience to turn loose upon society those known and believed by them to be criminals, and thus defeat the cause of justice, they are compounding crime, and merit every pain and penalty which the law would inflict upon those they defend.

The administration of justice needs to be speeded up. Punishment, to be effective, must be swift and sure. Each citizen must recognize his duty to society. He must realize that he can not live apart from society and apart from its responsibilities. Man was born into the world to serve as well as to be served.

In spite of the evils of the age which are so palpable, there is, and must ever be, a preponderance of good; else the race would cease to exist.

To keep the balance true, there should be stated, also, the fact that perhaps never before, in any land, at any time, has there been a larger body of splendid men and women, both adult and youthful, than that which now enriches our Nation and the world with their beneficent achievements. More is the pity, then, that with such examples before them, so many go astray.

In conclusion, let it be said what has so often been said before: There must be a high and noble destiny for man, else his creation would never have occurred.

That destiny is in his own hands. Aided by the fountains of experience, inspiration, and faith, from which he is ever able, at will, to draw, he must make his way forward to the goal of goals; and it is for him to determine whether his progress shall be swift or slow.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. J. Res. 72. Joint resolution to permit the temporary entry into the United States under certain conditions of alien participants and officials of the Third Olympic Winter Games and of the games of the Tenth Olympiad, to be held in the United States in 1932.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, December 17, 1931, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

278. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting supplemental estimates of appropriations pertaining to the legislative establishment under the Architect of the Capitol, for the fiscal year 1932, in the sum of $1,701,201.94 (H. Doc. No. 179); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

279. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting supplemental estimate of appropriation pertaining to the legislative establishment under the Architect of the Capitol, for the fiscal year 1933, in the sum of $137,000 (H. Doc. No. 180); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

280. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on preliminary examination of Brazos River, Tex., with a view to the control of its floods (H. Doc. No. 181); to the Committee on Flood Control and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

281. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on the Illinois River, covering navigation, flood control, power development, and irrigation (H. Doc. No. 182); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

282. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on preliminary examination and survey of Totuskey Creek, Richmond County, Va. (H. Doc. No. 183); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

283. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on preliminary examination of Black River, Wis.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

284. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report from the Chief of Engineers on preliminary examination and survey of the shore near Cold Spring Inlet, N. J., with a view to preventing its erosion; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

285. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on preliminary examination of Peace River, Fla.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

286. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on preliminary examination of inland waterway from Miami, Fla., to the Gulf of Mexico at or near Poinciana, by way of the Miami River, thence westerly along the Tamiami Trail, and thence southwesterly along the State highway; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

287. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on preliminary examination of St. Croix River, Wis. and Minn., from Stillwater to its mouth (H. Doc. No. 184); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

288. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on preliminary examination and survey of Parish Creek, Anne Arundel County, Md. (H. Doc. No. 185); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

289. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on the Sangamon River, Ill., covering navigation, flood control, power development, and irrigations (H. Doc. No. 186); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

290. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report from the Chief of Engineers on Tar River, N. C., covering navigation, flood control, power development, and irrigation (H. Doc. No. 187); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

291. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report from the Chief of Engineers on examination and survey of the Mississippi River below Cape Girardeau, Mo., covering existing levees, the construction of new levees, and with a view to determining the effects upon lands lying between the river and adjacent hills by reason of overflow (H. Doc. No. 188); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

292. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on Big and Little Sioux Rivers, Iowa and S. Dak., covering navigation, flood control, power development, and irrigation (H. Doc. No. 189); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

293. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on Cheyenne River, S. Dak. and Wyo., covering navigation, flood control, power development, and irrigation (H. Doc. No. 190); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

294. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Chief of Engineers on Marias River, Mont., covering navigation, flood control, power development, and irrigation (H. Doc. No. 191); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

295. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on the Gasconade River, Mo., covering navigation, flood control, power development, and irrigation (H. Doc. No. 192); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

296. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report from the Chief of Engineers on the Jefferson, Madison, and Gallatin Rivers, Mont. (Three Forks Basin), covering navigation, flood control, power development, and irrigation (H. Doc. No. 193); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1936) for the relief of Sidney Thayer, jr.; Committee on Military Affairs discharged, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (H. R. 2181) granting a pension to William W. Holmes; Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BYRNS: A bill (H. R. 6005) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to accept donations of sites for public buildings; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 6006) to punish the sending through the mails of certain threatening communications; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

SENATE

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1931

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou whose all-besetting care doth nourish every tender planting of Thy love; make of us high-minded men, who know our duties and our rights as well, that, knowing both, we may rend the chain of every mocking tyranny that hinders freedom's sway. Increase in us respect for Sovereign Law, the constituted will of states, that She alone may sit enthroned, now crowning good and now repressing wrong, until dissention at her bidding shrinks, and hiding his faint rays steals unperceived away. Give unto us those sweet rewards that decorate the brave who scorn inglorious strife, that looking back at day's departing hour on every conflict past we may meet life's peaceful evening with a smile and hear the Saviour's blessed words, "Well done!" Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. FESS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5821) to provide for the taxation of incomes in the District of Columbia, to repeal certain provisions of law relating to the taxation of intangible personal property in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 72) to permit the temporary entry into the United States under certain conditions of alien participants and officials of the Third Olympic Winter Games and of the games of the Tenth Olympiad, to be held in the United States in 1932, and it was signed by the Vice President.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

REPORT OF THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

FEES TO AGENTS, ATTORNEYS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, in compliance with law, his recommendation for the enactment of legislation fixing the minimum and maximum amounts for fees and expenses payable to agents, attorneys, etc., for services rendered in connection with claims against or payable by the United States, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate resolutions of the Provincial Board of Iloilo, P. I., favoring the granting to the Philippine Islands of immediate, complete, and absolute independence, which were referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

Mr. WAGNER. I present for printing in the RECORD and appropriate reference an act passed by the Legislature of the State of New York petitioning the Congress of the United States to submit a referendum to the citizens of the various States on the subject of prohibition.

The act of the New York Legislature was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Assembly, No. 1432

An act on the application of the Legislature of the State of New York petitioning the Congress of the United States of America to submit a referendum to the citizens of the various States

The people of the State of New York, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. The Legislature of the State of New York petitions the Congress of the United States of America to enact by proper and appropriate legislation measures requesting the legislatures of the various States to submit to the voters of their respective States at the next general election in the form of referenda the following questions:

1. Do you favor a repeal of the eighteenth (prohibition) amendment?

2. Do you favor a modification of the Volstead law to permit light wines and beers?

3. Do you favor a modification of the Volstead law so as to permit each State to define for itself what constitutes an intoxicating beverage?

4. Do you favor the continuance and strict enforcement of the eighteenth amendment and Volstead law?

SEC. 2. On the passage of this act the Governor of the State of New York shall forthwith cause to be transmitted to the President of the Senate of the United States and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and to each Senator and Member of Congress elected from the State of New York engrossed copies of this act.

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect immediately.

Mr. CAREY presented the following joint memorial of the Legislature of Wyoming, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation:

THE STATE OF WYOMING,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Wyoming, ss:

I, A. M. Clark, secretary of state of the State of Wyoming, do hereby certify that the annexed is a full, true, and correct copy of original House Joint Memorial No. 3, as passed by the Twenty-first Legislature of the State of Wyoming, as approved March 7, 1931.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Wyoming.

Done at Cheyenne, the capital, this 10th day of March, A. D. 1931.

[SEAL.]

A. M. CLARK,
Secretary of State.
By H. M. SYMONS,
Deputy.

Enrolled Joint Memorial 1, House of Representatives, Twenty-first Legislature of the State of Wyoming, memorializing the Congress of the United States of America, the Department of the Interior of the United States of America, and the Bureau of Reclamation of the United States of America to apply project power-plant revenues in accord with the act of Congress of December 5, 1924, commonly known as the fact finders' act

Whereas the Shoshone project in Wyoming is one of the established reclamation projects of the United States Bureau of Reclamation; and

Whereas the Garland, Frannie, and Willwood divisions of said project have been heretofore completed and settled, and the Garland and Frannie divisions thereof have been taken over by the unit holders thereon under appropriate contracts with the United States of America; and

Whereas after investigation by a fact-finding commission the Congress of the United States enacted what is commonly known as the fact finders' act, under date of December 5, 1924, which provided, among other things, that all net profits from the operation of project power plants should be applied: First, to the payment of construction costs due the United States of America for the construction of the project; second, to the payment of operation and maintenance assessments thereon; and, third, as the unit holders may direct; and

Whereas at the time of the passage of said fact finders' act there had been constructed in connection with the Shoshone project a project power plant at the Shoshone Dam in Park County, Wyo.; and

Whereas the Shoshone Irrigation District took over the operation and maintenance of the Garland division of said Shoshone project, and the Deaver Irrigation District took over the operation and maintenance of the Frannie division of said Shoshone project by appropriate contracts negotiated and consummated during the year 1926; the Shoshone irrigation district contract providing, among other things, that said district would pay its pro rata share of the cost of the operation and maintenance of said Shoshone power plant; and the Deaver Irrigation District contract providing, among other things, that it would assume and pay its proportionate share of the cost of construction of said Shoshone power plant, and that in the event the Shoshone Irrigation District would agree to assume and pay its proportionate share of such cost that the Deaver Irrigation District should then be entitled to own its proportionate share of said Shoshone power plant and to be entitled to its share of the profits therefrom; and

Whereas at the time the Shoshone Irrigation District contract was negotiated, the commissioners of said district and the officers thereof were advised by various officials and representatives of the Bureau of Reclamation that their contract entitled them to receive all of the benefits of the provisions of said fact finders' act relating to profits from the power plant theretofore constructed at the Shoshone Dam; and

Whereas it has since been held by the Secretary of the Interior of the United States of America that similar contracts executed by the United States of America with various irrigation districts on the North Platte project entitled said irrigation districts to their proportionate share of power-plant revenues from the Guernsey and Lingle power plants; and

Whereas, at a meeting of the commissioners and officers of the Shoshone Irrigation District held in the town of Powell, Wyo., on or about the 8th day of September, A. D. 1928, with the Hon. Roy O. West, Secretary of the Interior, and Dr. Elwood Mead, Commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation of the United States of America, the assurance was made and given by said Secretary and by said commissioner that if the Shoshone Irrigation District would present through the Bureau of Reclamation an amended or supplemental contract for repayment to the United States Government of the Shoshone Irrigation District's proportionate share of the cost of construction of said Shoshone power plant in accord with the act of May 25, 1926, which requires repayment of said construction cost within a period of 40 years after public notice, that such a contract would receive the approval of the Bureau of Reclamation and the Department of the Interior of the United States Government; and

Whereas such a contract was submitted by the Shoshone Irrigation District in September of 1928 to the United States Government through its Bureau of Reclamation; and

Whereas said proposal was thereafter ignored by the Commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation and the Secretary of the Interior, and without notice of any kind to the Shoshone Irrigation District, the Commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation proceeded to and did recommend to Congress that the act of March 4, 1929, should contain a clause which in effect purports to take from the Shoshone Irrigation District and the Deaver Irrigation District the net profits from the Shoshone power plant and would apply them, first, to the repayment of cost of construction of said Shoshone power plant; second, to the repayment of the cost of construction of the Shoshone dam; and, third, to be paid into and retained by the reclamation fund of the United States of America; and

Whereas the Deaver Irrigation District entered into its contract with the United States Government only after making demand of the Bureau of Reclamation that it be allowed to contract for its proportionate share of the cost of construction of said power plant under then existing law, which provided for repayment of cost of construction on the 5 per cent crop repayment basis, and being refused such contract, they entered into the conditional contract aforementioned; and

Whereas on or about the 8th day of September, 1928, at a meeting at the reclamation office in Deaver, Wyo., demand was again made by the Deaver Irrigation District of Elwood Mead, Commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation, in the presence of Hon. Roy O. West, Secretary of the Interior, and Hon. JOHN B. KENDRICK, United States Senator from Wyoming, and others, that the Deaver Irrigation District be given a contract for its proportionate share of said power plant under then existing law, which then provided for repayment on the 40-year basis for its proportionate share, and in response thereto assurance was given by said Elwood Mead that the Deaver Irrigation District need have no worry over the matter, because he would see that the said district's rights to its share of the profits from the Shoshone power plant would be protected; and

Whereas the decision of the Secretary of the Interior on the North Platte project, which has confirmed to the unit holders and landowners of said project, their rights given them in said fact finders' act to all the net profits of the North Platte project power plants, in effect takes largely from Wyoming power-plant resources and gives the same to Nebraska citizens; and

Whereas the carrying out of the newly adopted policy of the Bureau of Reclamation and the act of March 4, 1929, with reference to the Shoshone power plant will take said power-plant revenues from unit holders and landowners located entirely within the State of Wyoming and will give to the Bureau of Reclamation profits from a power plant located within the State of Wyoming, and will give to the United States Government for the benefit of the reclamation fund the use of another of the valuable resources of this State; and

Whereas Wyoming has heretofore contributed very largely of its resources to the revenues and income of the reclamation fund and has never received in return 50 per cent of the amount contributed: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Twenty-first Legislature of the State of Wyoming (the Senate concurring), That we do hereby memorialize the Congress of the United States of America to repeal the portion of said act of March 4, 1929, or to amend the same so as to carry out the provisions of the contracts between the United States Government and the Shoshone and Deaver irrigation districts which provide for the application of the revenues and profits from the Shoshone power plant in accord with the fact finders' act, to the end that the unit holders and landowners under said Shoshone project shall have all the benefits from the net profits from the operation of said power plant; and be it further

Resolved, That we hereby memorialize and petition the United States Senators from Wyoming and our Member of Congress to do all in their power to obtain the repeal or amendment of said act of March 4, 1929, in accord herewith; and be it further

Resolved, That we do hereby memorialize the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation of the United States of America to use their efforts to obtain for the Shoshone project, and the various divisions thereof, all profits from said Shoshone power plant in accord with the provisions of the fact finders' act; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this memorial be forwarded to the Wyoming Senators and its Representative in Congress and to the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation of the United States of America.

CLARENCE GARDNER,
President of the Senate.
CHARLES B. MANN,
Speaker of the House.

Approved at 11.20 a. m., March 7, 1931.

A. M. CLARK,
Acting Governor.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts presented the following resolutions of the General Court of Massachusetts, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, 1931.

Resolutions memorializing Congress with relation to the activities of the Federal Farm Board and its attempt to regulate the price of wool and mohair

Whereas the Federal Farm Board, created under an act of Congress, effective June, 1929, commonly known as the agricultural marketing act, is attempting to fix the price of wool and mohair and is, in that respect, interfering with the normal and lawful conduct of business by persons legitimately engaged therein; and

Whereas there have been and are now in the city of Boston and the Commonwealth of Massachusetts many persons engaged in the purchase and sale of wool and mohair; and

Whereas this business which has always constituted an occupation for many persons and an enterprise in which the Commonwealth has always taken a great pride and from which its citizens have received a large source of revenue: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts hereby records itself as opposed to so much of the activities of the Federal Farm Board as involve the purchase of wool and mohair in competition with an old and well-established trade conducted by private citizens in this Commonwealth in so far as those purchases by said Federal Farm Board are not needed at the present time to maintain the price of said wool and mohair; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of these resolutions be sent by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of Agriculture, to the Secretary of Commerce, and the members of the Federal Farm Board, to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress, and to the Representatives and Senators in Congress from this Commonwealth.

In house of representatives, adopted, May 21, 1931.

In senate, adopted, in concurrence, May 22, 1931.

A true copy.

F. W. COOK,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts also presented the following resolutions of the General Court of Massachusetts, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, 1931.

Resolutions making application to Congress in accordance with Article V of the Constitution of the United States to call a constitutional convention to amend or repeal the eighteenth article of amendment or to propose such an amendment for submission to the several States

Whereas a condition of widespread dissatisfaction prevails with the workings and results of Article XVIII of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States; and

Whereas it is desirable to attempt to improve, clarify, or quiet such condition; and

Whereas the only methods for repealing or modifying said Article XVIII are set forth in Article V of the said Constitution: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts, acting in pursuance of said Article V, hereby requests that Congress call a convention under said article for the purpose of proposing an amendment or amendments to the Constitution amending, modifying, revising, or repealing said Article XVIII; or that Congress, acting in pursuance of said Article V, itself propose such an amendment or amendments; and requests that in either case the same be submitted for ratification by conventions in the several States; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the Commonwealth forward forthwith to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress certified copies of these resolutions, attested by the clerks of both branches of the General Court.

Adopted March 13, 1931.

A true copy.

F. W. COOK,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD presented a petition numerously signed by sundry citizens of the State of Minnesota, praying for the passage of legislation known as "the farmers' farm relief act," which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE presented numerous communications from organizations and sundry citizens of the State of California, favoring the reduction of armaments by all nations, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KEAN presented a resolution adopted at a regular meeting of the Association of Grand Jurors of Essex County, N. J., favoring the passage of legislation prohibiting the manufacture, sale, importation, exportation, and use (except for lawful purposes) of explosives, brass knuckles, stilettos, machine guns, tear gas, tear bombs, and other weapons and instrumentalities used in the perpetration of crimes of violence, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH presented papers to accompany the bill (S. 567) to authorize the Secretary of War to sell to the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co. certain tracts of land situate in the county of Harford and State of Maryland, introduced by him on the 9th instant, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INCOME TAXES

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a letter with a resolution accompanying it. I ask unanimous consent to have the letter read and the accompanying resolution printed in the RECORD immediately following the reading of the letter. I do not ask for the reading of the resolution.

There being no objection, the Chief Clerk read the letter, as follows:

DEMOCRATIC CENTRAL COMMITTEE, CANADIAN COUNTY,
El Reno, Okla., December 14, 1931.

Senator ELMER THOMAS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Inclosed please find copy of resolution introduced by Judge James A. Rinehart and unanimously adopted at a meeting of the Murray Tax Reform Club at El Reno December 12.

I am Dutch descent, but I have a feeling that the proposed Hoover program is a move on the part of our Hebrew banker friends in New York to shoulder the cost of the war on the American public.

Very truly yours,

SIDNEY CLUTE,
Secretary Murray Club of Canadian County.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance, and is as follows:

Resolution

Whereas Andrew Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States of America, has forwarded to Congress a demand on that body to pass legislation raising the taxes on small incomes and inheritances and lowering the exemptions that now exist;

Whereas said proposed legislation, as set forth in the plan and demand of Secretary Mellon, raises the tax on small incomes approximately 700 per cent and raises the tax on large incomes of $50,000 or more less than 20 per cent; and

Whereas said plan or demand of Secretary Mellon raises the tax on corporations only one-half of 1 per cent and provides an exemption for corporations equal to that of individuals; and

Whereas said Secretary Mellon has announced that he will soon submit a bill for the approval of Congress establishing a moratorium or cancellation of war loans made to foreign countries;

Whereas it is the opinion of the Murray Club, of Canadian County, Okla., that said proposed tax is inequitable and unfair to the persons earning small incomes; and it is further the opinion of the Murray Club that the cancellation of debts owing by foreign countries is an act in favor of the big international banking interests, the burden and cost of which must be borne by the taxpayers of America; and it being further the opinion of the Murray Club that taxes should now be lowered instead of raised, and that European countries should be called upon to pay their honest debts of war: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Murray Club of Canadian County, Okla., That we condemn and recommend for disapproval the plan, bill, or demand of Secretary Mellon made to the American Congress known as the so-called income tax bill; be it further

Resolved, That we condemn and recommend for disapproval the passage of any bill creating a moratorium or the further cancellation in any amount of war debts owing by European countries; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be mailed to Hon. Senator THOMAS P. GORE, Hon. Senator ELMER THOMAS, and to the Hon. Congressman JED JOHNSON.

PROPOSED REFERENDUM ON CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a good deal of discussion has appeared recently in the public press with reference to the desirability of holding a referendum. It is not known how such a referendum might be held, there being no provision in the Constitution for a referendum as such. Various efforts have been made to present amendments to the Constitution in such a way as to provide for conventions in the States, especially chosen to consider such amendments. With the aid of a distinguished citizen of Connecticut, Mr. Selden Bacon, an attorney at law, I have prepared an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of conventions in a new manner, which I ask to have read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let it be read for the information of the Senate.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 57), proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by conventions in three-fourths of the several States, which conventions shall be composed in each State of delegates elected by a majority vote of the electors of the State voting at such election:

"Article V of the United States Constitution is hereby amended by adding thereto the following:

"'Provided, however, That no amendment conferring on the Government of the United States any added powers over the people of the United States or their individual rights, or any of them, shall hereafter be adopted validly otherwise than by conventions of the people meeting in their several States; and that any adoption of any amendment, whether by legislatures or by conventions, in order to be operative, shall be made within seven years after the proposal of such amendment.

"'The members of any constitutional convention in any State called for the adoption of any proposed amendment shall be elected at a separate public election, to be held not less than 90 days subsequent to the proposal of the amendment, at which election each qualified voter of the State shall be entitled to one vote for all the members of the convention.

"'The number of members to be elected to any such State convention shall in no case be less than the total number of Members of Congress and of the Senate of the United States to which such State shall be by law entitled at the time of the proposal of the amendment. The individual qualifications of members of such State conventions shall be the same as those now prescribed for members of the Electoral College.

"'The control of all other details of selection and meetings of any such conventions in the several States shall lie with the several States, respectively.

"'Any State or its people may by State constitutional provision hereafter enacted regulate the exercise of the power of the legislature of such State to adopt amendments to the Constitution of the United States.'"

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the International News Service has recently conducted an extremely interesting poll by consulting Members of the Senate and House of Representatives in regard to their desires or wishes relative to a referendum, and, in view of the great public interest in this matter, may I venture to express to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee the hope that the committee may hold hearings on this proposed amendment and similar amendments at an early date, in order, this being the long session of Congress, that we may have an opportunity for debating, under the rules of the Senate, at an appropriate time this question and similar questions closely related to it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in the case of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Connecticut, or any other amendment to the Constitution which may be submitted to the Judiciary Committee, if the Senator who submits it is anxious for a hearing and the appointment of a subcommittee, I have no doubt that the request will be granted without any delay whatever. I will say to the Senator from Connecticut that I shall be very glad to appoint a subcommittee as soon as the Committee on the Judiciary meets, and he will be notified of the membership of that subcommittee.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRINTING OF HEARINGS ON "AGRICULTURAL CONFERENCE AND FARM BOARD INQUIRY"

Mr. McNARY submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 4), which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That, in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the printing act, approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed 5,000 additional copies of the hearings held before the committee on "Agricultural Conference and Farm Board Inquiry" during the current session.

FLOTATION IN AMERICA OF FOREIGN LOANS

Mr. GORE. I send to the desk a Senate resolution, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 102) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to transmit to the Senate at once a list of all the names of banking houses and other institutions, partnerships, and individuals that have, since the conclusion of peace with Germany, notified the State Department of their purpose to float a foreign loan or to sell foreign securities in this country, showing the number and date of each such notification by each of such agencies.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the resolution lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under objection, the resolution will go over.

COMMUNICATIONS OF FOREIGN DEBTOR GOVERNMENTS

Mr. GORE. I send another Senate resolution to the desk and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the resolution be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 103), as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate any and all correspondence and communications by and between any representative of the United States and any foreign government debtor of the United States concerning its indebtedness to this Government and concerning reparation payments or concerning the alleged relationship between such debts and such payments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Let the resolution go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection, the resolution will go over.

Mr. GORE subsequently said: Mr. President, I desire to make a request at the instance of the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who is also chairman of the Finance Committee. I ask that the Senate resolutions which I introduced this morning may be referred to the Committee on Finance. I have the assurance of the Senator that the resolutions will be given early consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, Senate Resolution 102 and Senate Resolution 103, submitted by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMITTEE

Mr. COUZENS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 105), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized, during the Seventy-second Congress, to send for persons, books and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per 100 words, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

SMITHS CREEK, WILMINGTON, N. C. (S. DOC. NO. 23)

Mr. JOHNSON presented a letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce, submitting a review of the report on Smiths Creek in the vicinity of Wilmington, N. C., etc., which, on motion by Mr. JOHNSON, was ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

TAMPA AND HILLSBORO BAYS, FLA. (S. DOC. NO. 22)

Mr. JOHNSON presented a letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce, submitting a review of the report of Tampa and Hillsboro Bays, Fla., submitted to Congress by the Secretary of War on December 12, 1927, published in House Document No. 100, Seventieth Congress, etc., which, on motion by Mr. JOHNSON, was ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, the bill (S. 174) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes, has been referred to the Committee on Commerce. If appropriate at this time, I ask that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, there is no objection on the part of the Commerce Committee. I am agreeable that the order may be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

CONDITIONS IN MANCHURIA

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if there be no objection——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I was about to state, and, with the consent of the Senator from Mississippi, will state——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Mississippi for the purpose of calling a quorum?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I shall yield in just a moment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Arkansas is going to make some remarks, will he pardon me if I first make a request?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. May I have a resolution coming over from yesterday now considered? It was objected to on yesterday by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], but he has since withdrawn his objection to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I will yield the floor for the present.

Mr. JOHNSON. I thank the Senator from Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent that Senate Resolution 87 may now be considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? Let the resolution be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 87), which had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with an amendment, on page 1, line 4, after the article "the" where it occurs the second time, to strike out "Governments of China and Japan or to the Government of" and to insert "Government of China, Japan, and/or," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the Senate the notes, correspondence, and communications from the Government of the United States to the Government of China, Japan, and/or any other nation relating to the present existing conditions in Manchuria, and the controversy between China and Japan, which has resulted in armed encounters in Manchuria; and particularly any messages, notes, or communications from the United States Government to either the Governments of Japan or China referring to the treaty entered into at the city of Washington on the 6th day of February, 1922, by the United States, Belgium, British Empire, China, France, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, and Portugal, known as the 9-power treaty, and referring to the treaty entered into by Japan and China, the United States and other nations, and commonly known as the Kellogg pact; and also the notes, messages, letters, and communications sent or transmitted by the Government of the United States to the League of Nations or any individual or committee representing the League of Nations relating to the said conditions in Manchuria, and the said Chinese and Japanese controversy; or sent or transmitted to any individual or individuals representing the Government of the United States in said matters acting with or in conjunction with the League of Nations or the Council of the League of Nations, or any individual or committee representing the League of Nations or the Council of the League of Nations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of my friend from California whether he does not think, in view of the acute situation in Manchuria, that it would be wise and proper to insert in the resolution words to this effect, "providing that the same is not incompatible with the public interest." The controversy between China and Japan has presented many difficult and delicate situations, which have called for diplomatic skill of the highest order, to the end that a great conflagration might be averted. Our Government has had an important and honorable place among the various nations that have been dealing with this critical matter. It may be that the present moment is not the most suitable for giving publicity to all the negotiations that have taken place, and which are still in progress, concerning the question referred to.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I respond to the Senator from Utah by saying that it would not be inappropriate, neither would it be appropriate. It is such a resolution as can be responded to in exactly that form by the Secretary of State, if he so desires. That was, I think, the conclusion the committee reached. It may be put in either form. The Secretary of State, under a ruling which the Senate has made, may respond and say that it is incompatible with the public interest that certain communications shall be disclosed, and the Senate has ruled, within my recollection and within a brief period, that that is conclusive. So, it is left to him to determine.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. May I say that that question was before the committee, and the committee had in mind the proposition that, whether the phrase referred to by the Senator from Utah was in the resolution or whether it was not in the resolution, the power of the Secretary of State is the same, and, as there were precedents both ways, we did not think it necessary to insert the words suggested.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it seems to me that when we are dealing with matters within the jurisdiction of the executive department, and particularly where they pertain to our foreign relations, and where an acute and complicated situation exists, such as we find in the Orient, it might be unwise to ask the State Department to make public the communications which have passed between our Government and other governments in respect to such situation.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. We can neither compel nor require it. The Secretary of State will answer as he sees fit. Such things as he believes are not incompatible with the public interest I assume he will furnish the Senate; such things as he believes it is incompatible with the public interest to make public he will not furnish to the Senate. If so, I submit to the Senator from Utah that nothing is really accomplished, and I trust—because I am trenching upon the time of the Senator from Arkansas—that he will permit the resolution to be adopted.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of the resolution. I believe, however, that the burden carried by the Secretary of State at this particular juncture is so heavy that he should have the support and sympathy of his countrymen. For myself, I commend him for the excellent work which he has been doing in connection with a most critical situation, and I should be averse to asking him to disclose any information that might embarrass the State Department or those governments with which our Government has been cooperating in the efforts being made to prevent an international conflict, the serious consequences of which must be apparent to all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, before——

Mr. HARRISON. Now, I renew my suggestion, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Just a moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas does not yield for that purpose.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I arise now for the purpose of making reference to the question raised by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

The resolution which is now to come before the Senate was considered at length on yesterday by the Committee on Foreign Relations. Various questions as to the proper procedure were raised and determined by the committee. The conclusion was reached that under the precedents of the Senate, under the practice that has prevailed, the Secretary of State will determine whether the submission to the Senate committee of any data in his possession would be incompatible with the public interest, and that it would be a mere formality to amend the resolution in that particular.

Under the practice which has not been criticized recently, there is no doubt that the Secretary will retain as confidential any matter the publication of which, in his opinion, would endanger the public interest. For that reason the resolution was not amended as suggested by the Senator from Utah.

Everyone realizes that a critical situation exists in the Orient. Forces have been set in movement there that threaten the peace of a large portion of the population of the world. Many members of the Committee on Foreign Relations feel that publicity as to what is going on, and as to what steps are being taken to advance or safeguard the cause of peace, will of itself contribute to its preservation.

The old-time practices of withholding information from a people, who must pay the cost and bear the burden of fierce conflicts, have little support in the judgment of those who believe that substantially the same rules which govern conduct between individuals should be applied to transactions between nations. When the time comes, if it ever does come, that full information is made available to the public, there will be far less likelihood of involving this country, its people, and its resources in Old World wars than if the methods of secret diplomacy are given sanction and support.

It is readily conceivable to me that there may be in the record some matters which ought not to be published; but I do not care to invite the withholding of information which throws real light on the situation by incorporating in the resolution the suggestion referred to by the Senator from Utah.

We do not know what causes have set in motion the forces now at work. We do not know to what extent those forces may move. It may be that we are powerless to interrupt or to stay them; but it is right and proper that this body, charged with a measure of responsibility in crises like that at hand, should have all the information available to guide us in our action.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Arkansas whether he would have this information submitted to the Senate as in executive session, or as in open session?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The resolution calls for the submission of the information to the Senate; and I assume that unless the resolution is changed it would be subject to publication.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. May I ask the thoughtful Senator whether he would advise or suggest, now or hereafter, that this information, whatever it may be, should be submitted to the Senate as in executive session? If that is his opinion, I will respect it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, it will come to the Senate in executive session; but since we hold open executive sessions unless the Senate otherwise orders, when the information reaches the Senate if it is found desirable to proceed to closed executive session when the character of the information to be divulged becomes known in a general way, the Senate will have control of the matter; and, for my part, I will reserve judgment on that question until it arises. I should like every bit of this information, every word of it that can be published, to be published. I think the people of the country are entitled to information as well as the Members of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to address a question to the Senator from Arkansas in regard to the pending resolution; and I do this because his information on the subject is superior to any that I have.

The precedent used to be that when Congress sought information at the hands of a department it directed the Secretary to furnish the information, instead of requesting it. When information was sought at the hands of the President it was put in the form of a request, and the qualifying clause was added, "If not incompatible with the public interest." The point is whether or not we should recognize the right of the head of a department to comply or not to comply with the Senate's order or direction.

The precedent may have been changed. The Senator knows better than I.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think the resolution is in proper form. I do not think the effect of the resolution would be different if it employed the word "direct" instead of the word "request." So far as I am concerned, the word "request" is a polite term, and I prefer to use it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to suggest, in the interest of orderly procedure on this resolution, that if no objection be made to its consideration it be laid before the Senate; and then it will be open to debate or any amendment that may be offered, as I understand.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understood that the resolution had been laid before the Senate, and the Chair was just about to declare it disposed of.

Mr. NORRIS. If that is true, then I am in error.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I appeal to the Chair on that point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution has been laid before the Senate and read.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Chair was just about to put the question on its passage.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood the Chair to say, "Is there objection?"

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did that to give the Senator from Oklahoma a chance to be recognized.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, there is one inquiry I should like to make about this matter. Does the resolution call for this information to be furnished to the Committee on Foreign Relations or to the Senate?

Mr. JOHNSON. To the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was under the impression that it was to be furnished to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JOHNSON. No, sir; to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

POLICIES OF THE ADMINISTRATION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, a member of the President's Cabinet, the Secretary of War, Mr. Hurley, yesterday sought to arouse the slumbering cohorts of partisanship in an effort to glorify the achievements of President Hoover, and to criticize and condemn for their partisan action Democratic Members of Congress.

The occasion was the meeting of the Republican National Committee in the city of Washington; and perhaps, in pursuance of the custom that has long prevailed, some spokesman for the party was entitled to indulge in a measure of exaggeration.

The Secretary declared that the President has sent to Congress an economic program which, if enacted, will go far toward restoring normal conditions in the United States. He also declared that the President had taken on his shoulders the burdens of industry, finance, the railroads, the banks, the unemployed, and the distressed farmer; and that no one save the President is capable or has demonstrated capacity to ameliorate the present very distressing situation.

It must be apparent to one possessing ordinary intelligence that partisan Democratic measures can not prevail while the Republicans retain a majority of the Senate, and the Presidency with the veto power. President Hoover is constantly appealing for nonpartisan action. No sooner is that action obtained, however, than his spokesman, the Secretary of War, seeks to capitalize it into a glorious triumph for Hoover policies.

The only two outstanding partisan measures that have been enacted by the Congress since Mr. Hoover became President are the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of 1930 and the Federal farm marketing act. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] told us when the tariff measure was about to pass, and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] followed in an eloquent and glowing address, that immediately upon the passage of that measure the tides of adversity would be reversed, and that prosperity and happiness would again bless our land with abundance.

The President said that the Federal farm marketing act, framed in accordance with his personal views, would lift or lighten the burdens of agriculture and restore that industry to an equality with other industries. I ask those who hear me whether the eulogy pronounced by the Secretary of War on the Hoover administration is justified. Without attempting to ascribe now to the tariff law referred to its fair share of responsibility for the perpetuation of conditions which everyone knows are disturbing, and applying the same rule to the Federal farm marketing act, the fact is that business in the United States since the passage of those measures—business pertaining both to manufacturing and related industries and to agriculture—is in a worse condition than when those laws were passed.

Let not anyone imagine that it gives me any pleasure to make that declaration; for, after all, patriots or men claiming that title, whether Democrats or Republicans, must recognize as the first consideration the best interests of the country, and only that partisanship can in the end prevail which rests upon some such principle as that just stated.

Will anyone here assert that either the tariff act of 1930 or the Federal farm marketing act has been an emphatic success? From every part of the country we hear complaints and criticisms, and a measure of demand coming from Republicans and Democrats alike for the repeal of the Federal farm marketing act. That fact is stated for the single purpose of establishing my own conclusion, just asserted, that to whatever causes the result may be attributed the Federal farm marketing act has not proven of great benefit to agriculture.

I do not intend to go into the details of the criticisms urged against the manner of the administration of the law. I do not intend to relate the circumstance at length that the board's best remedy for low-priced cotton was for the farmer to plow up every third row and thus add to his own existing troubles the danger of being put in prison for destroying mortgaged property. Nor do I intend to analyze the processes by which the board has had on hand literally millions and millions of bushels of wheat while millions of people in the United States are suffering from hunger.

It might be said that for whatever cause the foreign commerce of the United States has been shrinking, shrinking, shrinking; and that the tariff act, which we were told would prove a panacea for all the ills with which we were afflicted, has been impotent to stop decline and depression. If the two acts to which I have referred have been successful, why is domestic business paralyzed in ever section, why are conditions pertaining to agriculture and unemployment constantly growing worse?

During the vacation of the Congress the President announced the threatened collapse of the German Government and appealed to so-called leaders, both Democrats and Republicans, in the two Houses of the Congress to indicate their consent to a moratorium respecting war debts which he proposed to suggest.

When the suggestion was made and the indications pointed to its acceptance, there was a slight quickening in business activity, which, however regrettably, continued for only a few days. Do Senators remember how prompt the President's propagandists, like the "Prophet Pat," were to claim credit for the Chief Executive as having saved the world from utter collapse, to glorify his name for an achievement which, while it had no lasting results in so far as our business or commerce was concerned, was given credit for having prevented a collapse in Germany?

Secretary Hurley is known as the Cabinet member closest to the President. In his address yesterday he bitterly assailed the Democrats in Congress, and sought to take advantage of their readiness to forego partisan opposition in so far as that can be done without sacrificing the public interests.

The moratorium was not the sole instance in which the President appealed to Democrats to show their patriotism by foregoing partisanship and to support his policies along with equally patriotic Republicans. When the naval arms limitation conference was about to assemble in London the President appointed a Democratic Senator as one of the delegates, and when the treaty was negotiated, and ratified with relatively more support from Democratic Senators than was accorded by Republican Senators, White House messengers raced to the news reporters and the press bureaus proclaiming the treaty as the outstanding triumph of Republican skill in the conduct of foreign relations.

The first delegate to be selected to the Geneva Disarmament Conference expected to convene next February is a Democratic Senator of international renown. The process of this administration is to ask the opposition to forego every partisan consideration, and, when that is done, to proclaim the results as distinct triumphs for President Hoover and his administration.

Realizing that the President will veto measures colored with Democratic partisanship should the same pass the Congress, it is our purpose and policy, just as far as I am capable of stating and defining it, to make every improvement possible in the measures brought forward during the present Congress, fully recognizing President Hoover's responsibility and duty to recommend and suggest and also his power to veto.

That does not mean that we shall become nonpartisan or that we shall fail to take fair advantage of the mistakes of our adversaries. It does mean that we recognize the perils which threaten our people in their affairs—perils which, if not brought about by Republican measures and policies, have certainly come into existence while the Republican Party has been in complete control of this Government.

When occasion arises we shall not hesitate to advocate reforms, but we do not expect to be able to reflect into legislation our views touching measures recognized as subjects concerning which the two parties emphatically disagree so long as the present occupant is in the White House or his party associates outnumber us in the Senate.

We intend to contribute our best efforts for the promotion of the welfare of the country, to pursue a sane and fair policy, and I do not believe that fair-minded citizens will give their support to a political organization whose head one day asks nonpartisan action and, when that is given, the next day holds aloft a flag of triumph in glorification of his own partisanship.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the timely remarks of the distinguished leader on this side prompt me to bring to the attention of the Senate another very striking figure, who played a very large part in the recent meeting of the Republican National Committee in Washington.

From the newspaper reports I am led to sympathize with the President and these representatives of the Republican Party who assembled here. Just before the meeting we saw in the papers that the delegates came here very much depressed, that their hopes were at low ebb. They needed consolation and some tonic, which only the distinguished senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], now presiding in this body, could give to them. He is a smart, shrewd, experienced man in politics. He has spoken to national conventions on many occasions and has fooled many people in his own State in order to get elected to office.

Seeing this picture of dejection and depressed looks and forlorn hopes, he made a speech. He played the part of the pawnbroker. Of course, I take it that it was after conferring with the Secretary of War, Mr. Hurley, and, perhaps, the President and my astute friend there the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and other leaders. He said that the idea is to sell Hoover to the country. That was the burden of his song, that was the strong point of his speech.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does not the Senator really think that in their hearts they would like to give him away?

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator mean the President or the chairman of the Republican National Campaign Committee?

Mr. BARKLEY. Either one or both. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. So it is said.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to my distinguished friend.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Perhaps the party of which the Senator is such a distinguished member would like to get rid of the chairman of its national committee.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think the distinguished Senator and his party colleagues would have anything to talk about if we got rid of Mr. Raskob.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I ask the Senator if he would not like to get rid of him.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator asks me, I say no. Chairman Raskob is a very sincere and conscientious gentleman, intensely interested in the principles of the Democratic Party and the welfare of the country. He has rendered very great service to the Democratic Party. Naturally he is a source of annoyance to my Republican friends.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Does not the Senator from Mississippi think that the Republicans ought to wait until short selling has been abolished before taking any such step?

Mr. HARRISON. Short selling has become so prevalent under the Hoover administration that my friend the chairman of the Republican National Committee has adopted the plan of selling Hoover short, certainly not long.

Mr. GORE. "Its a bear!" [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; it is a bear raid.

But this selling idea is only carrying out the plan that was employed two years ago by the Republican organization. Here is the character of advertising that was promoted by the Republican committee in 1928, big full-page advertisements in all the papers of the country. One of them said, in large type:

Ten candidates in one, the Republican Party presents in Herbert Hoover.

How he has shrunk since then! What an exaggeration! Another one read:

On the peaks of prosperity.

[Laughter.]

In this paid advertisement in behalf of the election of the President I notice another paragraph to which I wish to call attention. Of course, the signature of my friend who now presides over this body is not there, but other good Samaritans who contributed liberally to the party signed the statement. It is in big type, and reads:

On the peaks of prosperity. Your directors, the Republican Party, wish to report reduced debts and taxes, factories in full capacity, export trade at full tide, basic agricultural improvements, and the highest dividends of record.

That is the way they sell their candidate to the country; and so my friend the chairman of the Republican National Committee has undertaken the very difficult job of selling again the President to the country.

I noticed an editorial in the New York Times on my friend's speech in which the editor of the Times said Chairman FESS was not very enthusiastic in his speech, that when he undertook the job of selling Hoover it looked like he appreciated the hard task he had on his hands. A part of the whole scheme was that, after the chairman began to sell Hoover short, the Secretary of War as spokesman of the administration should come forward and make this his keynote speech. It is unfortunate that the speech was made. Senators on the other side of the aisle deserve congratulations for the way they have conducted themselves under the circumstances. I do not know of anyone on the other side of the Chamber who approved, except that on one occasion I think my friend the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] perhaps claimed credit on behalf of Mr. Hoover for the moratorium and said that deed in itself would reelect him. I notice that the Senator from Utah shakes his head, and I accept the Senator's apology. [Laughter.] He says he did not say that. So there are none of the Senators who tried to play politics in this great crisis of the country's history.

It is indeed unfortunate, just as the Congress convenes and we are to begin to legislate to help solve some of these delicate international and domestic questions, that the President should select the Secretary of War as his spokesman, and he should begin this tirade against the Democratic Party and its organized leaders. One can see running through the speech that he is trying to revive the old campaign issue of two or three years ago, which is unworthy of any political organization, of religion in politics. One can hardly find one of the ill-advised leaders of the Republican Party but what he wants to prate upon Raskob—the same character of campaign that put the Republicans into office two years ago.

The Secretary of War says we have no program, that the Democrats are without a plan, that we are waiting to catch Hoover ideas before we adopt our plan. The Democratic Party may make many mistakes, but it will never go so far as to make the mistake of accepting the Hoover ideas in its plan of action and program. His ideas generally are but bubbles—bubbles in the air. His housing scheme is such a bubble, and I dare say not a Senator on the other side of the aisle to-day understands it. I have seen nothing in the papers to indicate that any of them approved of it. It is such ideas in times like these that have weakened the President in public esteem, and destroyed the confidence of the people in the leadership of their Government.

Coming at this particular time when Congress is just meeting, is it a just criticism that as yet the Democrats have offered no plan or program? We did not know until about three or four days before the Congress convened that we were to elect the Speaker of the House of Representatives. It was in doubt up until a very short time before we convened. But I say, in that body, which is now controlled by the Democratic Party, they have been able to harmonize their differences and organize. But here—in this Chamber where you Republicans control—you have not been able to harmonize your differences and get together even upon the election of a President pro tempore.

So here we are traveling along and the spokesman of the administration says that not yet have we offered a plan to the country. Why, up until the President sent his message to the Congress and the Secretary of the Treasury reported his tax plan, we could not get a particle of information from the Treasury as to what its program would be and what it would do. Indeed, up until about two months ago every manifesto from the White House was telling the people that we were not going to have increased taxes in the country, and only when the leader on the Republican side went to the White House a few weeks ago and came back with changed views did the country get the idea that we were to have a bill before us to increase taxes. Yet the Secretary of War, in his fairness, representing the President, criticizes the Democrats for not yet having a tax plan. We will have a tax plan and it will be a tax plan that will not put the heavy burdens upon the great masses of the people, such as the administration is now recommending to Congress.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I apologize for interrupting the Senator, but I wish to say at this point that the Secretary of War is a distinguished citizen of my State. Personally he is an intimate friend of mine, and I might add that I love him as a brother. I would forgive a great deal at his hands. But I think it ought to be remembered that Secretary Hurley, while he is a Republican, is also an Irishman. He has a keen sense of humor. He enjoys a joke. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. I too am very fond of Secretary of War Hurley. I have known him for 20 years. He is a fine man, but with such influences around him he could hardly be expected to escape becoming contaminated. He has become subservient and obedient to the wishes of the President. I know he comes from my distinguished friend's State. He comes from Tulsa. There is another distinguished Republican out in Tulsa, a friend of the Secretary of War. His name is Lorton. He is editor of the Tulsa World, one of the leading newspapers of the Southwest. I notice that his high estimate of Mr. Hoover is not the same as that of Mr. Hurley, because in an editorial published in the Tulsa World Mr. Lorton said:

Mr. Hoover is a most colossal mistake.

So they do not agree very much on that question.

We have not yet had time to present our plan of taxation. We would not be entitled to control the Government if we did not study carefully the details of any tax plan and evolve one that would incorporate the principles of the Democratic Party to lay the least burden upon the American people. But we are working upon a plan and we will have a plan. The one thing that we have agreed upon, so far as the policy committee representing the Democrats of the House and Senate is concerned, is that we have got to cut the expenditures of the Government and we are going to employ all necessary means to do it. We can talk about reducing taxes, we can talk about shifting taxes from this to that, but the finest road to travel, and I think the Democrats appreciate it, is to cut wherever possible the expenditures of the Government departments without impairing efficiency. So we have given out that kind of an expression as the sense of the Democratic policy committee.

If we look at the figures, we will find that the Department of Commerce, when Mr. Hoover presided over it as Secretary of Commerce, increased expenditures more rapidly and to a greater extent than any other department of the Government service. On the matter of employment, I find that in 1929, and this has no relation to the census, the employees in the Commerce Department numbered practically 17,000. That number was increased from 1922, when it was about 11,000. It shows the largest increase in the matter of employment of any department of the Government. If we take the executive department itself, where Mr. Hoover directs expenditures, we find that that department has increased perhaps more than any other particular branch of the Government. Its expenditures for employees now amount to something like $400,000 a year. President Hoover talks about retrenchment. He talks about saving the taxpayers. Yet we have not seen where he has curtailed his army of secretaries and employees around the White House.

My friend the chairman of the Republican National Committee has just been unfortunate in his remarks. As my friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has well stated, the Democratic Party, where the welfare of the country has been at stake, has never played politics, and it is not going to do so now. He cited the instance of the naval limitation of arms conference. He did a great work in that conference, and we supported the measures relating to that matter. I can remember the time, two years ago, and my friend the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] remembers it, when the collapse came upon the New York Stock Exchange and there was trouble in the air, the Secretary of the Treasury called some of us up there and said, "I think it will restore confidence and might save the situation if we could pass a tax bill giving some measure of relief." We came back here and almost unitedly worked to put that plan through. We did not play politics.

So not long ago, during the past summer, when conditions were going from bad to worse, and the President asked many of us about his moratorium, did we play politics? Did we take advantage of an acute crisis? No. We unhesitatingly told him that we would cooperate with him on the 1-year moratorium plan. I told him that, and I expect to vote that way. Many other Members of Congress were not consulted, and, of course, they are going to vote their own convictions on the subject; but we did not play politics; and yet, almost the very night that it was announced, the publicity king of the Republican National Committee, on the radio, over a nation-wide broadcast, was extolling the moratorium as one of the great achievements of President Hoover, notwithstanding the President himself in a statement announced that there was no politics in it, and that the Democrats were entitled, with him, to some credit for that action.

When following that, a few weeks ago, the President called into conference Republicans and Democrats and laid another plan before them, did we pick flaws in it and try to play politics in that case? No. The President wanted to create a national credit association in order that the banks might get a credit of $500,000,000. It was proposed to relieve the banks of the country that were experiencing troublous times; it stated that it was going to help them to free some of their credits, that it was going to save some banks from ruin. I thought it was wonderful; that the psychology of the proposal was good. People were led to believe that they were going to get something which they have not gotten, because the other day I was informed that the National Credit Association had loaned only four and one-half million dollars. Many alleged achievements with trumpets and brass bands are heralded, but when they are analyzed they really do not exist.

Mr. President, it is unfortunate that this partisan contest started at the other end of the Avenue; but it is not going to swerve us in the discharge of our duties. We appreciate that this country is sick; that we are in a terrible condition; that there are lines of unemployed; that industries are closed down; that our export trade is gone; that banks have failed; that there is sorrow in the hearts of tens of millions of the American people; but we are going to try to give our very best in a nonpartisan way to help lift the American people out of this bog and mire of economic depression.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I merely wish to say one word at this point. The Senator from Mississippi has referred to Mr. Gene Lorton as the Republican editor of a Republican newspaper in Oklahoma. Mr. Lorton is my personal and political friend. He is the editor of the World; and I desire to say to the Senator from Mississippi that the World has gone Democratic—and that I use that word in a double sense.

Mr. HARRISON. I was delighted when the influence of that great paper turned to the Democratic cause. It showed the fine sense of a great journalist.

"DEPLETION ALLOWANCES AND FEDERAL TAXES"

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, I have an address by Donald A. Callahan, president of the Callahan Lead-Zinc Co., of Wallace, Idaho, on the subject of "Depletion Allowances and Federal Taxes." I ask unanimous consent to have the address printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

DEPLETION ALLOWANCES AND FEDERAL TAXES

By Donald A. Callahan, president Callahan Lead-Zinc Co., Wallace, Idaho

SINCE CONGRESS WILL PROBABLY CONSIDER THE AMENDMENT OF THE PRESENT DEPLETION PROVISIONS UNDER THE FEDERAL INCOME TAX LAW, THE MINING INDUSTRY SHOULD BE IN AGREEMENT AS TO THE FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES INVOLVED

That amendment of the depletion provisions under the income tax law with relation to mines will be considered by the next Congress seems reasonably certain. Various changes have been proposed, among them a liberalization of the discovery clause, unit depletion, a percentage of gross income and a fixed percentage of net income. The latter method, providing for depletion at the rate of 33⅓ per cent of the taxpayer's net income, has been embodied in a bill introduced in the House of Representatives by Congressman CHARLES B. TIMBERLAKE, of Colorado. This method was given preference in the preliminary report on depletion by the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, although the staff did not commit itself to the rate.

This being the case, it seems important that the mining industry should be in agreement, at least as to fundamental principles, before the Congress meets in December. In reaching an agreement it may be necessary for individual operators to make what they may consider concessions. It is unlikely that any concessions thus made will have more than a temporary effect, for it should be clear that once a fundamentally sound basis for depletion is arrived at it can not but be beneficial to the entire industry in the long run.

Mining is an uncertain business in its best aspects. It depends upon a great many contingencies for its prosperity. In the first place, of course, there must be metal which can be mined at a profit. Secondly, there must be financial means available to carry through the period of exploration and development. Thirdly, there must be a metal market of sufficient stability to insure a long-term operation of properties once developed. And, lastly, there must be a fundamentally sound basis upon which taxes of local, State and Federal Governments shall be computed.

This latter basis, as far as the entire industry is concerned, should first of all be reasonable, and secondly, it should have a sufficient element of certainty to enable the operator to plan his operations for the future and to determine, when once his ore has been mined and marketed, the amount of tax due his Government without encountering the disturbing factor of reassessment after he has closed his books for the period and made distribution of whatever profits may have been realized.

The provisions of all Federal income tax laws relating to mines have never given the operator a feeling of certainty as to the amount due or of security as to future reassessments. He has been obliged to maintain either whole or part time staffs of experts to make his tax return in conformity with involved bureau regulations and in accordance with the best information he can secure as to his tax liability. He has been obliged, if he is a prudent operator, to pay out large sums of money in engineering and accounting services in setting up the valuation upon which his depletion allowance is to be based. And, even after providing himself with these safeguards and expending large sums of money in an endeavor to correctly report his income, he has found after several years that he is faced with the claim that the basis for the return has been entirely incorrect and that additional sums must be expended in maintaining his position before the Revenue Bureau. It matters not in the end whether the taxpayer or the Government wins in the controversy. Both have been out a considerable sum of money and neither has benefited. This is not a fanciful statement. The industry knows that it is the actual experience of a countless number of mine operators since Federal income tax laws were first enacted.

The greater part of these difficulties has arisen over allowance for depletion. The greatest uncertainty which has existed in the minds of mine operators since income-tax legislation was begun has been that of the rate of depletion allowed and the manner of ascertaining the allowance. Volumes have been written upon the subject, but it was not until the preliminary report on depletion by the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, popularly known as the Parker report, was released that a definite statement of the workings of the various revenue laws, together with substantiating figures, was placed in the hands of those interested.

That report quite definitely commits the staff to a preference for the allowance of depletion upon a basis of percentage of income. Since that time hearings have been held by the joint committee, and the proponents of the percentage method have laid their case clearly before the committee. The hearings on this subject, which took place in December, 1930, covered the subject from both a theoretical and practical standpoint. Men who had been engaged in the industry for years gave the committee the benefit of their actual experience, and others, who had been in the bureaus of the Government having to do with the administration of the law, set forth clearly the effects of its actual operation. All agreed that under the present method there were complexities, lack of accuracy, and difficulty of determination of depletion allowances; that these resulted in an excessive cost of administration to the Government; a delayed settlement, costly to both the Government and the taxpayer; and a gross inequality among the taxpayers themselves. On the other hand, they agreed that the percentage method was simple, furnished an accurate and easily determined basis resulting in economy of administration, prompt settlements, and an equality among the taxpayers.

Opposed to these conclusions are three very powerful agencies. First, the bureau which has the administering of the law—a typical example of what we unfortunately may expect in dealing with our far-flung bureaucratic organization of government. The Treasury heads perhaps oppose a change, but that opposition does not rest upon a thorough consideration and understanding of the principles involved. It rests upon the confidence which those heads repose in the men most interested in maintaining the present status—the employees of the bureau who are technically informed as to the matter involved and whose security as public officials rests upon the maintenance of administration as at present. One could expect nothing but opposition from the valuation section. One perhaps can expect nothing but acquiescence upon the part of the political heads of bureaus and departments in the opinions furnished by their technical staffs. That opposition should be considered as powerful only in the event that Congress, having created a bureau of government, abdicates entirely its constitutional duty of seeing to it that the agency which it has created does not transcend its original authority. That authority is to administer such laws as Congress may enact and to refrain from attempting to influence legislation in behalf not of the taxpayer nor the Government, but of itself.

Secondly, there is the opposition of certain mine operators, an opposition which is based upon two compelling considerations: First, that of self interest; and, secondly, that of fear. Self-interest dictates to those who enjoy depletion allowances out of line with those which others in the industry possess; and fear influences those who do not understand and would rather endure the evils they know of than to risk the loss of all depletion allowances.

An examination of the appendix to the published hearings before the joint committee discloses some startling facts. Among these is the following: That the weighted average of the ratio of depletion allowed to net income from property for the seven years from 1922 to 1928 shows that gold and silver had a ratio of 37, copper 60.5, lead and zinc 32.5, iron 41.2, coal 31.6, and sulphur 45.8. It is quite apparent from these averages that certain branches of the industry have been enjoying greater advantages than others. It is easy therefore to understand why certain operators do not give whole-hearted support to a method which will equalize conditions, not by raising the ratio to the point of the highest allowance but by fixing the ratio at a point which will insure justice to the operator and a proper return of taxes to the Government. The question arises, Shall the entire industry allow this question to drift as at present to the point where an indignant Congress, in an endeavor to effect a fair return from those who have enjoyed past benefits, wipes out the depletion provision completely and compels all metal producers to pay a tax upon capital which they have consumed in carrying on their business?

The third agency which is strongly and rather influentially opposed to a change in the present methods is that body of specialists which has become necessary under the present complicated systems of ascertaining tax liability. These people are known as tax consultants or counselors. They either practice independently as other professional men or they are attached permanently to the staffs of large operating companies. In either event their prosperity depends upon two factors—first, a continued necessity for their employment under a system which places the ordinary operator or manager at a disadvantage; and, secondly, their ability to secure depletion allowances. This profession, like every other, has its outstanding representatives and they get the business. They get the business because they achieve results, and every time they achieve a result one of two things must have occurred. Either the Government has been defeated in an attempt to unjustly tax one of its citizens or an undue advantage has been secured by one taxpayer over all others in that particular line of business, and the Government has suffered in its revenues accordingly. We will presume that in the majority of cases the former element has prevailed and the tax has been finally adjusted to a fair basis as far as the individual taxpayer is concerned. It is plain to be seen that without the intervention of the expert tax man the taxpayer would have suffered a distinct loss. This leads us to inquire: What of the hundreds and perhaps thousands of smaller taxpayers who have not had the means to secure such expert assistance? If the principle applied in the larger case were not sound and capable of being maintained in the courts, if the facts upon which the assessment was based have not been as represented by the Government where larger amounts are involved, is it not reasonable to assume that the Government erred in applying similar principles in all cases? There is no question but that the present system of taxation of incomes from mining operations, particularly as it relates to allowances for depletion, has placed a premium upon the skill possessed by expert tax adjusters and resulted in injustice to those who are not in a position to secure the services of such men.

This body of tax experts opposes the principle of percentage depletion almost to a man. Privately they may admit that the principle is sound, but their business depends upon a continuance of the present complicated methods, and it is not a part of the ethics of this or any other highly paid profesison to join in agitation for correction of a system which incidentally has resulted in tremendous profit to the members of that profession.

Against the opposition of these three strong and more or less organized influences the mining fraternity generally should unite and it should have the support of those who are interested in simple and equitable procedure in tax matters. Experts have agreed that the application of the percentage method in arriving at depletion will not decrease the Government's revenue and many are of the opinion that it will materially increase it. They are agreed likewise that its simplicity of administration will result in a reduction of the costs of collection. In this period of depression our wisest counselors are advising that we start at that end to balance our budgets. It is the reduction of governmental costs and not the levying of additional tribute upon business which will bring our Governments—State and National—back to a sound financial basis. Then, again, it is universally agreed that the application of the percentage method for depletion will mean a steadier income, which will not be affected to so great a degree by recurring periods of prosperity and depression in the mining industry. This argument should carry great weight, for it is the inherent weakness of income taxes generally that they furnish only fair-weather revenue. When business is good there is plenty of money coming into the Treasury, and the tendency, unfortunately, of our legislative bodies is to incur new governmental liabilities. When business is poor, the source of our revenue is dried up and we find the Government, as at present, facing a deficit. Percentage depletion, applied to the mining industry, would have a stabilizing influence as far as the revenue from that industry is concerned.

In this connection I quote from an editorial of A. B. Parsons in the January, 1931, issue of Mining and Metallurgy. He was referring to the hearings before the joint committee and says:

"On one point in connection with the proposed percentage system for the calculation of mine depletion allowance on income-tax valuation there is general agreement; the method is definite, understandable, and straightforward. The present so-called "analytical" method, in actual practice, is indefinite, abstruse, and circuitous. Its administration necessarily is based on official opinion or judgment on matters which are utterly insusceptible of accurate estimation. As to whether the proposed allowance of 33⅓ per cent on net profits would, in the long run, prove to be a more equitable basis as between the mining industry and other groups of taxpayers is difficult to say. As between individual mining companies it might be more equitable, for the reason that the companies that employ the most adroit, influential, and highly paid tax experts now have a big advantage. Little wonder that the only dissenting voice at the recent congressional hearing on the proposed new system is raised by a group of income-tax counselors. Not that we would do differently were we in their shoes."

It may be that there are some operators who feel that the demand for the application of the percentage principles can not be substantiated and that perhaps the entire allowance of depletion may in a sense be questionable. Perhaps this sentiment has been created by agitation against certain allowances for depletion which have been made in the past. To all these I say that the mine operator owes no apology to anyone for demanding a proper basis for depletion of his ore reserves. That demand rests upon absolute justice, for we are dealing now with an income tax law and not a tax upon capital. The Government does not in theory tax capital, and yet, if a proper allowance is not made for depletion, that is in effect what it accomplishes as regards the mining industry. The only question with which we as an industry should be concerned is that the application of the principle of depletion shall be so just and equitable that the smallest operator, without intervention of expert assistance, shall receive as just an allowance for his depleted capital as does the mammoth corporation which is able to engage the best-trained assistance in the market to establish its claims.

It is not the question of depletion itself which is being questioned. It is the application of that principle to individual cases and separate classes of the mining industry which has aroused suspicion and antagonism in certain quarters. As I said before, this is one of the grave dangers which confronts the industry as a whole and one which the industry should be guarding itself against by agreeing upon the application of a principle which can not possibly result in inequitable application.

There is another grave danger to which I would like to call the attention of the industry, particularly of that portion of the industry which feels that it is doing very well under present conditions and is fearful of a change. That is the danger of the general application of the principle of dilution. This principle has been applied in the past, according to the appendix to the report of Hearings Before the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, as follows:

Silver and gold	1
Copper	None
Lead and zinc	125
Iron	None
Coal	None
Sulphur	None

These figures show that in the past dilution has been confined practically to the lead and zinc properties in the tri-State field. What will become of the depletion allowances of those companies which have underestimated their units and secured a high unit rate for depletion if the principle of dilution be generally applied? Not only will the existing depletion allowance melt away under the decreased unit rate but grave complications involving great expense will arise in connection with the allowances which have been made in the immediate past and the allowances to be made in the future. It is generally conceded that dilution is mandatory and not optional. For a just application of the law it should be mandatory. There should be no options in the administration of tax laws.

Let us assume that a property has been estimated as of March 1, 1913, to contain 100,000,000 units of ore. This 100,000,000 units has been held by the bureau to constitute the owner's capital and the whole of his capital. A valuation is assigned to these units under the present arbitrary, scientific, guesswork system which depends on so many unknown and unknowable elements that it is ridiculous. Let us assume, however, that the valuation works out to be $2,000,000, or 2 cents per unit. The producer proceeds to take depletion at this rate. After some years he has exhausted one-half the original units and has 50,000,000 remaining, or a value for depletion of $1,000,000.

Now assume that in the course of development of the deposit an additional quantity of ore amounting to another 50,000,000 units is disclosed. He can not be allowed discovery value on the additional ore because we will say it is a continuation of the original ore body. What to do? Either the taxpayer will be denied depletion entirely upon the additional 50,000,000 units disclosed or the $1,000,000 balance of the original valuation must be spread or "diluted" to cover the 100,000,000 units now remaining at a new depletion rate of 1 cent per unit.

I am not going to discuss the complications which unquestionably will arise from the general application of the principle of dilution. I am merely calling attention to the fact that those who feel that they rest secure with either original or discovery allowances for depletion may well consider the danger of the universal application of the principle of dilution and its consequent loss of unit allowance and expense of final adjustment. It is alarming, to say the least, to consider what may occur should the principle of dilution be recognized finally as mandatory, and settlements which have been considered final reopened for a revaluation of the units which serve as the base for depletion.

Should this question of depletion allowance be considered by the next Congress, the industry as a whole can look forward to several elements which should be taken into consideration and which should result in a final determination which for the long pull will be to its advantage. They are—first, a necessity for simplification of governmental machinery in order to reduce costs; second, the establishment of a basis which will insure a more equitable method of taxation; and, third, the desire on the part of the Congress, after the recent unhappy experience of the Government, to bring about a more stable revenue from the mining industry. These elements should all be resolved in favor of application of the percentage system. They were recognized in the preliminary report on depletion by the staff of the joint committee. They seem to be thoroughly understood by the members of the committee itself in hearings held last December. As a matter of fact, several members of the committee expressed themselves as favorable to the change, the only question in their minds being the rate to be used.

I have sought to lay stress upon the dangers which confront the industry in this connection. These are troubled times and the question of revenue is one with which the Congress must be primarily concerned for there is a Budget to be balanced in the face of unprecedented demands for Government aid. We have in our favor the precedents which the Congress itself has established—first, its recognition of the right to depletion based upon the theory that depletion is a return of capital to the owner; second, the recognition of the fact that the difficulties of valuation have made it necessary to grant depletion because of new discoveries; and, third, the application of the principle of percentage depletion to the petroleum industry. In addition to this, the application of the principle in Canada and its successful working out furnishes a most convincing argument. With these factors in favor of a scientific and equitable solution of this involved question, it is unthinkable that individual members of the mining fraternity will consider what they look upon as an immediate advantage in withholding their support. They must realize that congressional approval of a system which has been inequitable as among operators and at the same time has resulted in loss to the Government in revenue can not be expected. Far better to join in a unanimous demand for the working out of a system which will insure stable revenue, do away with involved administrative procedure, and result in the object which is of primary concern—a return to the industry generally of its capital tax free.

THE WORLD COURT

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD certain remarks of Hon. John W. Davis on the question of our entrance into the World Court, and a statement of various bar associations on the same subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address and statement are as follows:

LEGAL ASSOCIATIONS IN EVERY PART OF THE COUNTRY URGE SENATE RATIFICATION OF WORLD COURT PROTOCOLS, ACCORDING TO SURVEY MADE PUBLIC TO-DAY BY JOHN W. DAVIS

Since the Senate Foreign Relations Committee has agreed to take up the question of reporting these protocols to the Senate at its meeting on December 16 next, the recommendations which groups of lawyers all over the country have recently made become significant. Very recently a New York newspaper, whose consistent opposition to the court is well known, implied that the action of the American Bar Association of a few weeks ago, vigorously urging Senate ratification of the pending protocols, was hasty and stimulated. The fact is that the recent action of the American Bar Association constitutes the fifth formal expression made by the association upon the subject of the court in as many different years. Under such circumstances it could hardly be, as the aforesaid newspaper implied, the expression of a small bloc within the organization, determined to commit the group as a whole to a court policy not held by a majority of the membership. My own study of the situation leads me to believe that the recent action of the American Bar Association is substantially a reflection of a country-wide legal sentiment that has been separately expressed by many local legal bodies. Even a brief reference to these will indicate the depth and the comprehensiveness of the consideration which bar associations have given to this question through many years, as evidenced by the result of the significant present survey covering many State and local legal groups.

REFERENDA AND RESOLUTIONS BY LARGE CITY BAR ASSOCIATIONS

Many of the legal groups which have recently acted have merely brought up to date action taken by them in previous years. The New York City Bar Association has discussed the question at several meetings. The San Francisco Bar Association has taken two referenda on the question. A number of the associations that have acted have done much more than simply pass a resolution. The Cleveland Bar Association, after thoroughgoing discussion of the question itself, organized a speakers' bureau to furnish speakers without charge to local organizations interested in informing their members upon the merits of the court question and the present status of the negotiations leading to the adherence of the United States.

I personally know of no State, city, county, or local bar association anywhere in the United States whose formal action has resulted in the expression of opposition to the adherence of the United States to the World Court. In addition to the New York City, the Cleveland, and the San Francisco Bar Associations, city bar associations in New Orleans, Denver, Chattanooga, and Little Rock have expressed their belief that the Senate should complete our entrance into the court this winter.

STATE BAR ASSOCIATIONS THROUGHOUT COUNTRY URGE RATIFICATION

Since the spring of this year alone the Virginia, Texas, Louisiana, Arkansas, Oregon, Vermont, and Missouri Bar Association have called upon the Senate to ratify the protocols. The Vermont Bar Association, with only two sessions, devoted the whole of one of them to a discussion of the World Court situation, opening the meeting to the public because of its realization that this question ought to be widely discussed and more generally understood. The Arkansas Bar Association has not failed, at its last four annual meetings, to urge Senate action. The Connecticut, Minnesota, New York, Tennessee, Ohio, Mississippi, Nebraska, and New Jersey Bar Associations are others that have called upon the Senate to ratify the protocols.

MANY COUNTY BAR ASSOCIATIONS ACT

It would take too long to enumerate all the county bar associations that have already dealt with the World Court question or those which, because of their expectation that the question will be settled this winter, have scheduled meetings this winter for discussion of the World Court treaties. Six county bar associations in New Jersey alone have already dealt with the question or intend to; in the State of Washington three have meetings on the court scheduled; the Findlay Bar Association in Ohio, the Starke County Association in Indiana, the Throckmorton County Association in Texas, the Twin Falls Bar Association in Idaho, and the Cascade County Association in Montana intended to discuss the question at coming meetings. And so the list goes on. Many of these county bar associations have appointed special committees to report on the World Court protocols to their members; others have scheduled debates; still others have, through their directing boards, submitted resolutions to the full organization.

The development of judicial procedure by a permanent court for the adjudication of international disputes will inevitably interest all lawyers who are genuinely concerned in the vast problem of the development of international law. I believe it can be demonstrated that the legal groups of the country have shown a fairly continuous and vigorous interest in this whole question from the time of the First Hague Conference 32 years ago, when our delegates urged the other nations of the world to establish just such a World Court as has now been working successfully for nine years. It seems to me the Members of the Senate can not fail to take account of the fact that a body of competent legal opinion, representing all sections of the country, now, after formal consideration of the merits of the question, is urging the Senate to complete our entry into the court by ratification of the pending protocols. The emphatic recommendation of these legal groups proceeds from a conviction that to refuse ratification of the protocols and thus to defeat the adherence of the United States to the court is to deny a traditionally American ideal, to disregard the recommendations of both national parties, and to invalidate the Senate's own action of 1926 providing for our entrance into the World Court on the conditions that are now satisfied by the pending treaties.

THE BAR ASSOCIATIONS AND THE WORLD COURT

Because the completion of the adherence of the United States to the World Court hinges upon legal questions (somewhat too technical to be understood in detail by a wide public), the attitude of the many bar associations that have carefully considered the issues is of more than ordinary significance.

Do the three treaties awaiting ratification satisfy the Senate's 1926 reservations?

Does the Root formula outlining a procedure for the fifth reservation impair or modify the absolute power of veto over advisory opinions reserved by the Senate in its fifth reservation?

To these critical questions, bar associations, local, State, and national, have, after thoroughgoing discussion, furnished an interesting and conclusive body of reply. Many of the bar associations have considered the court question not once but progressively from year to year, following the various stages in the negotiations relating to the adherence of the United States. The American Bar Association, for instance, which in September last specifically urged the Senate's consent to the ratification of the three pending treaties, has formally dealt with the court five times since 1923—when it first passed a resolution urging the adherence of the United States to the court. That fact should sufficiently reply to the New York newspaper, more zealous than informed in its anti-court campaign, that assailed the American Bar Association's most recent action as a stimulated expression not representative of the association's opinion as a whole, and as the triumph of a small bloc within the organization determined to commit the group as a whole to a court policy not held by a majority of the membership. A more detailed statement below shows the deliberation that accompanied the association's most recent action.

The American Foundation has been at some pains to establish how far the question of the court has received consideration by leading legal groups in all parts of the country. The summary, below, of action taken by outstanding State, city, and county bar associations is by no means complete. We may not, in all cases, have been notified of action taken. And since the question at issue has been, since the passage of the Senate's 1926 resolution, different from the general question of adherence which was the issue in the years preceding 1926, we have not included here resolutions in favor of adherence passed in 1923, 1924, and 1925 by bar associations (those of Massachusetts, Boston, Delaware, and others) but have confined ourselves to recent resolutions referring to the present status of the court question and recommending ratification of the three pending protocols.

Mr. Guy Thompson, elected president of the American Bar Association, at its September, 1931, meeting pointed out that the report adopted by the association on September 17, urging Senate ratification of the protocols, had been prepared by a competent group which had the report under consideration for several months preceding its presentation to the association. Copies of this report were sent to the 27,914 members of the American Bar Association approximately 30 days before the association's virtually unanimous indorsement of it on September 17, 1931. A brief summary of the extent to which the American Bar Association has dealt with the World Court situation testifies that the September indorsement was not lightly given:

In 1923 the American Bar Association passed a resolution urging the adherence of the United States to the World Court.

In 1926 the association expressed satisfaction at the passage of the Senate's 1926 resolution providing for the entrance of this country into the court.

In 1927 the association urged the resumption of the negotiations between the United States and the signatory nations of the court in the belief that the "differences * * * between them * * * would seem to be easily capable of reconciliation."

In 1929, very shortly after the publication of the protocol of accession, with Mr. Root's formula, the association expressed its belief that the "provisions of the protocol would seem to provide full protection to the interests of the United States with respect to advisory opinions, and to carry out fully the purport of the Senate reservation * * * ."

In 1931 the association, at its annual meeting on September 17 last, adopted the report of its committee on international law, quoted in part, below. The whole report consisted of a detailed analysis, in 16 closely printed pages, of the situation past and present with regard to the entry of the United States into the World Court and of a summary of the traditional atttitude of the American Bar Association toward adherence to the World Court:

"Believing that the Permanent Court of International Justice is the greatest of international instrumentalities for the preservation of peace and of justice between nations, this committee recurs to the approval given to the participation of the Government of the United States in the World Court, upon the terms and conditions set forth in the protocol of accession of the United States. It requests the American Bar Association to reaffirm at its forthcoming session in Atlantic City the action taken at the meeting of the association in Memphis in 1929: That the Government of the United States shall adhere to the permanent court upon the terms and conditions as stated in the protocol of adherence, to which it is a signatory; and the association respectfully requests and earnestly urges the Senate of the United States to advise and consent" to the ratification of the three pending protocols.

STATE BAR ASSOCIATIONS

In 1931, during the spring and summer months alone, resolutions urging the Senate to ratify the World Court protocols were passed by the State Bar Associations of Virginia, Texas, Tennessee, Louisiana, and Arkansas; early this fall the Bar Associations of Vermont, Oregon, and Missouri added a clear demand for ratification of the protocols. Other State bar associations, the views of which were already recorded—the New Jersey and Mississippi Bar Associations—reminded the members of the importance of the question by discussion of it at their annual meetings.

Typical illustrations of the manner in which State bar associations have dealt with the court are furnished by the following:

THE ARKANSAS BAR ASSOCIATION

In 1929 this association urged the adherence of the United States to the World Court; in 1930 (in the spring) the association urged President Hoover to send the World Court protocols to the Senate; and in 1931, expressing its belief: "That the protocol of accession, including Mr. Root's formula for the operation of the fifth reservation concerning advisory opinions, accepts the Senate's 1926 reservations subject only to certain procedural agreements and without modification or change of the reservations themselves," and recalling that "The Arkansas Bar Association has, at its last three meetings, urged the adherence of the United States to the World Court," urged "the Senate to give its consent to the ratification of the three protocols at the earliest practicable time in order that the Senate's own resolution of 1926, providing for the adherence of the United States to the permanent court, may become effective."

The Arkansas Bar Association also urged the American Bar Association to bring the subject before the full association at its meeting, as it did, this September.

THE CONNECTICUT BAR ASSOCIATION

On December 9, 1929, the date set by President Hoover for the signature by the United States of the three World Court protocols, the Connecticut Bar Association appointed a committee of five members to report to the association on the status of our adherence to the World Court. The report submitted at the annual meeting of the full association six months later carried with it a resolution, which was adopted by the association, stating its "belief that the future economic and commercial growth of the United States would be stimulated and stabilized by the development of a comprehensive system of international law * * *" and its further belief that "ratification by the Senate of the protocols signed by the direction of the President is required both by the self-interest of the United States and by its natural obligations as a member of the community of nations."

THE ILLINOIS BAR ASSOCIATION

The chairman of the committee on local organization considered the World Court protocols so important that he asked for their inclusion among the topics recommended in the October bulletin for consideration by every local bar association in the State.

THE MINNESOTA BAR ASSOCIATION

Very shortly after the draft of the protocol of accession was made public, this State bar association passed the following resolution:

"The association has examined the draft protocol for the adherence of the United States to the Permanent Court of International Justice and is of the opinion—

"1. That the adherence of the United States is an essential step to the organization of peace and a step desirable in itself;

"2. That the draft protocol protects in all respects the interests of the United States; and

"3. That therefore the protocol should be promptly signed and ratified by the United States without further amendment."

THE NEW YORK STATE BAR ASSOCIATION

This is another bar association that has dealt with the World Court question at several of its meetings—in 1927, in 1928, and in January, 1931, when it urged the Senate to ratify the World Court protocols because of its belief "that all interests of the United States are properly safeguarded, and the fifth reservation of the Senate, regarding advisory opinions, has been complied with."

In one of its earlier reports the New York State Bar Association, in urging the Senate to complete the adherence of the United States to the World Court, said:

"The attitude of the New York association in this respect could scarce be better phrased than in the language of President Coolidge in his inaugural address:

"'Where great principles are involved, where great movements are under way which promise much for the welfare of humanity by reason of the very fact that many other nations have given such movements their actual support, we ought not to withhold our own sanction because of any small and inessential difference, but only upon the ground of the most important and compelling fundamental reasons.'"

THE TENNESSEE BAR ASSOCIATION

The resolution unanimously passed at the June, 1931, meeting of the Tennesseee Bar Association reflects the discussion and resolutions that have come from a number of important city bar associations in Tennessee, notably those in Chattanooga, Knoxville, and Johnson City. In "respectfully petitioning the Senate to consent to the ratification of the protocols at the earliest practicable time, so that the Senate's resolution of 1926, providing for the entrance of this country into the World Court, may be made effective and the adherence of the United States to the court achieved," the Tennessee Bar Association recorded its agreement with the Department of State's declaration that by the present protocols the difficulties which caused the 1926 reservations have been met.

THE VIRGINIA BAR ASSOCIATION

A former president of the Virginia Bar Association, Mr. Eppa Hunton, jr., president of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad, drafted and submitted to the association the resolution which it unanimously indorsed at its meeting on August 1, 1931. The association points out that:

"The three protocols are approved by the administration and by many leaders of both political parties."

The three State bar associations that have acted most recently are:

THE OREGON BAR ASSOCIATION

On September 25, 1931, this bar association, recalling its indorsement of ratification of the World Court protocols made in 1929, just after the protocols had been made public, confined itself this time to an "earnest recommendation for the adherence by the United States to the protocols submitted by the President to the Senate."

THE VERMONT BAR ASSOCIATION

The whole of one of the October, 1931, sessions of the Vermont Bar Association was devoted to an address on the World Court and to an open forum following the address. After a thorough discussion, a resolution was passed, recalling the fact that the Vermont Bar Association had (so early as 1924) urged the entrance of the United States into the World Court, reviewing the changes in the situation that had taken place since 1924, and urging ratification, without amendment, of the protocols now awaiting the Senate's action.

THE MISSOURI BAR ASSOCIATION

This is the State association that has most recently passed a resolution. In urging the Senate to "advise and consent" to the ratification of the three protocols "now pending before the Senate," the association expressed its belief that the World Court is the "greatest of international instrumentalities for the preservation of peace and of justice between nations," expressed its pleasure "in the fact that there is a profound and fixed conviction abroad throughout the world that settlement of disputes or conflicts among nations shall never be sought except by pacific means, which conviction has been crystallized into treaty form by the Kellogg-Briand peace pact, into which nearly all the nations of the world, including the United States of America, have entered," and further expressed its agreement with "the view of Secretary Stimson that our country can safely adhere to the said court."

Other State bar associations that have passed resolutions urging ratification of the World Court protocols include: The Ohio Bar Association, the Louisiana Bar Association, the Mississippi Bar Association, the Nebraska Bar Association, the New Jersey Bar Association, and the Texas Bar Association.

CITY BAR ASSOCIATIONS

THE NEW YORK CITY BAR ASSOCIATION

Charles Evans Hughes, George W. Wickersham, and John W. Davis are among those who have addressed the several meetings that this association has devoted to consideration of the merits of the World Court question. Its first action was taken on February 28, 1923:

"The Association of the Bar of the City of New York joins in what it believes to be the wise judgment of the American people that the United States ought to become one of the supporters of the Permanent Court for International Justice at The Hague, and that our Government should therefore adhere to the protocol establishing the court in the manner set forth by the President in his message to the Senate of February 24, 1923."

In October, 1929, the association again took definite action urging the completion of the adherence of the United States to the World Court in a resolution that referred to its earlier position, recalled the Senate's 1926 resolution providing for the adherence of the United States to the World Court and, expressing the conviction that the present protocols fully meet the position taken by the Senate, urged their prompt signature (and they were signed a few weeks after the New York City Bar Association's action was taken) and ratification "without further amendment" by the Senate.

THE CLEVELAND BAR ASSOCIATION

In addition to passing (in April, 1930) the resolution, quoted in part below, recommending ratification of the protocols, the Cleveland Bar Association has announced two meetings to be held on the World Court alone, has appointed a special "World Court committee" composed of members of the bar and has, through an especially organized "public relations committee" of younger members of the bar, volunteered to supply speakers on the World Court to Cleveland and neighboring organizations. Members of the Cleveland Bar Association long associated with the effort to secure impartial consideration for the World Court question throughout this country are Newton D. Baker, former Justice John H. Clarke, and Walter Flory, who is now president of the Cleveland Bar Association. The Cleveland Bar Association's 1930 resolution expresses "its warm indorsement of the action of the President of the United States in signing the protocols, and its recommendation to the Senate of the United States that the action of the President be ratified to the end that the United States become, upon the terms proposed, a member of the World Court and lend its countenance and assistance to this great attempt to remove from the field of international controversy justiciable disputes by subjecting them to determination in accordance with legal principles and procedures by an eminent, learned, and impartial court of justice," and recalls the fact that "the American Bar Association, the Ohio State Bar Association, and the Cleveland Association have consistently approved the adherence by the United States to the World Court and have repeatedly declared their approval."

THE SAN FRANCISCO BAR ASSOCIATION

In addition to a resolution passed several years ago, calling for adherence to the World Court, this association has taken two referenda of its members. In 1928 the result of the vote taken was a request that negotiations in the World Court matter be resumed with a view to adjusting the difficulties delaying entrance into the court. In the spring of 1930 the association reported as the result of its second referendum a vote of 154 to 60 in favor of its resolution "that the Bar Association of San Francisco advocates the ratification by the Senate of the protocols providing for the adherence by the United States to the World Court."

THE NEW ORLEANS BAR ASSOCIATION

Pointing out that the conditions which the Senate attached to its 1926 resolution "have been accepted by the member nations of the court in the protocol embodying Mr. Root's formula for the operation of the fifth reservation, as well as the acceptance of all five reservations," the New Orleans Bar Association urged the "unqualified approval by the Senate without unnecessary delay" of the three World Court protocols.

Other city bar associations that have passed resolutions urging ratification of the World Court protocols include the Little Rock Bar Association, Arkansas; the Shreveport Bar Association, Louisiana; the Denver Bar Association, Colorado; the Pawtucket Bar Association, Rhode Island; the Chattanooga Bar Association, Tennessee; the Knoxville Bar Association, Tennessee.

The board of governors of the Philadelphia Lawyers Club has taken similar action.

COUNTY AND OTHER LOCAL BAR ASSOCIATIONS

Since there are over a thousand local bar associations, space does not permit full mention of the replies that have come from county and other local bar associations all over the country indicating the ways in which the World Court question has been brought to the attention of members. In a number of cases the executive committee or the board of governors has discussed the question and has presented its conclusions for the consideration of the full membership; a great many county bar associations now write that the action of the American Bar Association at its annual meeting in September stimulated their own interest and that meetings which they are holding in October, November, and December will be devoted to consideration of the World Court question. Some bar associations—for instance, the Lackawanna Bar Association in Pennsylvania, covering Scranton and its vicinity—have a ruling requiring two meetings on any question upon which formal action is taken and these meetings are being arranged. A number of associations have appointed special committees of three or five to report on the World Court question to the full membership and to present appropriate resolutions. Mention is here made of a few of the more significant ways in which the interest of lawyers in county bar associations has been demonstrated.

COUNTY BAR ASSOCIATIONS IN NEW JERSEY

The fact that the New Jersey Bar Association has passed a resolution strongly urging Senate ratification of the World Court protocols and that it reaffirmed this position at its latest meeting and gave the chief place at its midyear meeting to John W. Davis for a speech on the court, may explain the unusual interest shown by local bar associations in New Jersey in the World Court question.

Resolutions urging ratification of the World Court protocols have been passed by the following New Jersey county associations:

THE HUDSON COUNTY BAR ASSOCIATION

Expressing its agreement with the report which Secretary Stimson made to the President, that "by the present protocols the dangers which seemed to inhere in the rendering of advisory opinions by the court at the time the question was last presented to this Government in 1926 have been entirely removed," the Hudson County Bar Association "urges the Senate to give its consent to the ratification of these three protocols at the earliest practicable time in order that the Senate's resolution of 1926, providing for the adherence of the United States to the permanent court, may become effective."

THE MONMOUTH COUNTY BAR ASSOCIATION

Recalling the long-standing support of the American Bar Association and the resolution passed by the New Jersey Bar Association in support of ratification of the World Court protocols, the members of the Monmouth County Bar Association expressed their agreement with the two larger bodies in urging ratification of the World Court protocols.

Two county bar associations in New Jersey have appointed special committees to report on the World Court situation to their members and to submit appropriate resolutions to them—the Cumberland County Bar Association and the Bergen County Bar Association.

Two New Jersey County Bar Associations report that the question will be discussed at their next meetings—the Essex County Bar Association and the Somerset County Bar Association.

OTHER COUNTY BAR ASSOCIATIONS

Resolutions urging Senate ratification of the pending World Court protocols are reported by the following local bar associations as the result of recent meetings:

The Pope County Bar Association, Arkansas; the Owensboro Bar Association, Kentucky; the Madison Parish Bar Association, Louisiana; the Penobscot County Bar Association, Maine; the Middlesex County Bar Association, Massachusetts; the Faribault Bar Association, Minnesota; and the Buffalo County Bar Association, Nebraska.

Stimulated by an article in the Nebraska Law Bulletin, setting forth clearly and accurately the importance of the World Court and the work it has done, the Buffalo County Bar Association devoted one of its meetings this spring to the World Court and thereafter stated its conviction that "one of these protocols, the protocol of accession, including Mr. Root's formula for the operation of the fifth reservation concerning advisory opinions, accepts the Senate's 1926 reservations subject only to certain procedural agreements and without modification or change of the reservations themselves," and urged the Senate to give its consent to the ratification of the three court protocols.

THE JOHNSON COUNTY BAR ASSOCIATION, INDIANA

This association "urges the Indiana Senators to give their individual and combined influence and votes to completing the adherence of the United States to the Permanent Court of International Justice," and names among other reasons for its action "its conviction that the time is ripe to take some decisive step looking to the elimination of resort to war by nations in an effort to settle international disputes; and in the full belief that it is the duty and also within the power of nations as well as of men to adjust such differences as may exist between them, of whatever nature, by peaceful means."

THE WARD COUNTY BAR ASSOCIATION, NORTH DAKOTA

A special meeting (luncheon) of this association was called on September 24 for the sole purpose of ascertaining the views of the members who "were unanimously agreed that entrance into the court was desirable."

The following bar associations report the appointment of special committees to report upon the protocols to their members or describe other ways of bringing the question before the membership:

THE NEW BEDFORD BAR ASSOCIATION, MASSACHUSETTS

The president of this bar association has appointed a committee of three to report on the World Court protocols to the membership; the president is himself the member of a similar committee of three appointed by the New Bedford Chamber of Commerce to report on the World Court situation to that organization.

THE FIFTEENTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT BAR ASSOCIATION, LOUISIANA

The president of this bar association addressed its members on September 19. No provision was made for taking the views of the members. The president, feeling the issue to be of first importance, has personally written to each of the association's members.

THE TWIN FALLS BAR ASSOCIATION, IDAHO—THE CASCADE COUNTY BAR ASSOCIATION, MONTANA

Resolutions have been prepared by a special committee for presentation at the next meeting of the association's membership.

The following bar associations report coming meetings at which the World Court protocols will be discussed: The Niagara Falls Lawyers' Club will have a debate on the subject; the Brooklyn Bar Association, New York City; the Bronx County Bar Association, New York City; the Adams County Bar Association, Pennsylvania; the San Gabriel Bar Association, California; the Lebanon County Bar Association, Pennsylvania; the Trenton Bar Association, Nebraska; the Southern Oregon Bar Association; the Hampden County Bar Association, Massachusetts; the Lackawanna Bar Association, Pennsylvania (the board of governors has discussed the protocols at the October meeting; action, by resolution, will be taken in November at a second meeting); the Volusia County Bar Association, Florida; the Throckmorton County Bar Association, Texas; the Morgan County Bar Association, Illinois; the Cleveland County Bar Association, North Carolina; the Lake County Bar Association, Ohio; the Harlingen County Bar Association, Texas; the Waycross Bar Association, Georgia; the Marion County Bar Association, West Virginia; the Fayetteville Bar Association, West Virginia; the Southern Circuit Bar Association, Georgia; the Washington County Bar Association, Oklahoma; the Hunt County Bar Association, Texas; the Coos County Bar Association, Oregon; the Starke County Bar Association, Indiana; the Findlay Bar Association, Ohio; the Snohomish County Bar Association, Washington.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in this morning's Philadelphia Record on the first page is an editorial entitled "A Sick World Waits on the Congress of the United States." I do not necessarily indorse all the statements of that editorial, but it is a very forward-looking editorial and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Record, Thursday, December 17, 1931]

A SICK WORLD WAITS ON THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES

Congress should take the United States off the present gold standard immediately.

If the Government fails to take the initiative now, its hand will be forced eventually, when it will do little or no good.

If Congress acts now, it will save much human suffering and speed the return of the world, as well as this country, to normalcy.

We need inflation to cure our own depression. But even more important we must forget gold to relieve the despair of the rest of the world which is in debt to us.

The smartest thing smart Uncle Sam can do at this moment is to let his debtors get the best of him. Sometimes it's smart to be dumb.

The Record knows that it will be bitterly denounced for these statements. We speak bluntly and sincerely because that is the only course set by patriotism and courage in a national crisis. The Record is not edited tactfully, or it would not recently have urged "sure lower wages" as better than "high uncertain wages," in the face of the President's demagogic plea to maintain high wages.

That false propoganda about maintaining wages is one of the reasons we must go off the gold standard. The President has made a fetish of a certain dollar figure on the pay envelope. He has made it difficult to change that number of dollars. The surest and quickest way to meet the situation which he has created is to leave the same number of dollars in the envelope, but to make more dollars and to change the value of the dollar.

Value of money is a complicated concept to discuss, rendered doubly difficult by the emotional element that enters into it.

Such is human nature that the man who is used to a wage of $10 a day feels poor if he is reduced to $8 a day, even if the $8 buys as much as the $10 he formerly received. He would be better content if he continued to receive $10 with the purchasing power of $8 than $8 with the purchasing power of $10.

Cutting a man's pay hurts his pride and self-respect. If men were absolutely reasonable and logical, they would be satisfied to have the number of dollars they receive adjusted from month to month, according to the purchasing power of the dollar.

But men aren't that way. It is a very human fault that many of us measure our self-respect by the number of dollars in the pay envelope. The middle-aged man hates to receive fewer dollars per week than he earned when he started in his trade as a lad, and all the economists in the world can't reason him out of that notion.

That element of human emotion, or human "unreason," is the cause of the confusion of our professors of economics. They formulate laws for a logical world, peopled by reasoning beings. To them man is a logical entity, while, in fact, he is an emotional unit, with many of his emotions inherited from the Stone Age.

He begets his respect for gold from antediluvian days when gold was the most useful, and, therefore, the most precious metal. The metallurgists have found a score of metals and alloys which supply every need of man more efficiently than gold. All gold could disappear from the world without humanity being discomfited, and yet we worship gold as the most desirable element in the world.

GOLD IS VALUABLE TO-DAY FOR THE EMOTION IT PRODUCES

People tend to have confidence in a government which possesses much gold. But if, for other economic causes, that confidence in the government is lost, despite this possession of gold, gold becomes absolutely valueless; nay more, it intensifies distrust of government, because, added to other emotions of depression, is the fear that the government will lose the gold which it possesses.

Thus you have the otherwise incomprehensible phenomenon of a nation like Great Britain terrified by loss of gold, fearing to go off the gold standard, and becoming more prosperous and content immediately after it takes the plunge.

A country about to go off the gold standard is like a man about to have a tooth pulled. He suffers and dreads the operation. But once the aching molar is out he is relieved and goes about his business.

Of course, it would be better not to lose the tooth, and he might not have lost it if he had had it properly treated when it first began to ache.

Of course, it would have been better if the United States did not have to go off the present gold standard, and it would not have been necessary if we had had leadership in Washington which would have acted last year, or even last spring, to remedy the world depression.

But now it's too late for half measures. The President's nostrums of liquidating and financing corporations are piddling attempts at temporary inflation. Probably no President has tried harder and performed more badly than Mr. Hoover. He has made economic mistake after mistake.

His advocacy of artificial maintenance of wages, his 1-year moratorium a year late, Farm Board, high tariff, are but a few of the major mistakes which have destroyed world confidence in our Government in spite of our possession of the greatest amount of gold in the history of our country.

From this loss of confidence has developed a national fear, a fear that has gripped and paralyzed the minds of our leaders. The common people are punch-drunk and dazed. Our "best minds" are impotent. Many plans and solutions of the present situation are offered, but all are complicated and would take years to put into effect.

The Gerard Swope plan is a notable instance. Swope, president of the General Electric Co., one of the greatest manufacturing companies in the world, suggests that each industry be allowed to combine and take care of its own unemployment situation. It's a great plan, but it would take a couple of years to sell it to the voters and another couple of years to put it into effect.

Congress can act to-morrow on the gold standard and end the depression within the week.

We wonder how many of our readers noted the word "present" in our first sentence. We advocate going off the present gold standard. Congress could reduce the gold content of our dollar 25 per cent and relieve the tension, or it could go off the gold standard entirely, as we did during the war and at several other periods in our history. Which course is better is an open question.

If Congress acts immediately, reducing the gold content of the dollar would probably be sufficient. If no action is taken now, it will undoubtedly be necessary to go completely off the gold standard.

Either course means inflation, and God knows the United States needs inflation and would welcome it!

What of the more than $4,000,000,000 gold in the United States Treasury, our critics will say.

Of course, this gold will be depreciated. Suppose it drops 75 per cent in value—a loss of $3,000,000,000.

But that is a drop in the bucket compared with the $70,000,000,000 deflation of New York Stock Exchange securities since October, 1929; as much more in curb and unlisted securities throughout the Nation, in real estate and bonds, private businesses and inventories, so that $300,000,000,000 is a conservative estimate of the deflation of values as measured against an inadequate money standard.

Abandoning that money standard might wipe out three billion of gold value but restore a major part of the three hundred billion in property and security values.

A sick world waits on the Congress of the United States.

RELIEF BY GUESS

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the New Republic of October 7, 1931, by Mr. R. L. Duffus, entitled "Relief by Guess."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the New Republic, October 7, 1931]

RELIEF BY GUESS

The second winter of the worst depression of modern times finds the United States in the position of an army with only a vague idea of the number and resources of the enemy it has to fight, and with an almost equally vague idea of the extent of its own ammunition and the adequacy of its service of supplies. The list of things we do not accurately know about unemployment and the probable needs of the unemployed during the coming winter would, if filled out, constitute a statistical description of the depression. We do not know the exact number of the unemployed, though Mr. W. P. Mangold, in the New Republic of September 9, using all available data, arrives at an estimate of between 9,310,000 and 10,560,000. We do not know how many of the unemployed still have access to resources which will tide them over without resort to public or private charity. We do not know how much it will cost to give public or private relief to those who will suffer without it. We do not know whether the existing and proposed means of obtaining this problematical sum will actually suffice to produce it. Yet without this knowledge relief work is guesswork. If we guess wrong we may find ourselves facing a major crisis before spring.

Efforts to collect and analyze information as to the actual need and the amount and sources of probable relief have indeed been made by various agencies, notably the Association of Community Chests and Councils and the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. But no comprehensive figures for the entire country have been arrived at, or at least have been made public, and it is by no means certain that any will be. One reason for this, no doubt, is the difficulty of the task and another is the belief of the national administration and of organizations which share its policy that relief should be locally provided for and locally administered.

But accepting it as inevitable that there is to be no authoritative national canvass of the situation, we may legitimately ask how the system of local relief is working out and is likely to work out in representative American cities. The New Republic put this question, in somewhat more elaborate form than it is stated here, in a questionnaire recently sent out to heads of charitable organizations in a number of the leading communities. The results are not comprehensive, but they are significant.

As might be taken for granted, practically every city expects to have to spend more on relief this winter than it did last winter. In New York City, according to a letter from Mr. William Hodson, executive director of the welfare council, the total for the 12 months from October, 1930, to October, 1931, was about $23,605,000. This estimate, like other similar ones, is exclusive of unreported items which can not be traced and of expenditures for veterans' relief, relief to the blind, assistance given the aged, and aid to mothers. These latter categories represent money paid out according to law in good years and bad, though Mr. Hodson points out that relief work of this kind has had to be greatly expanded because of the depression. Leaving these items out, Mr. Hodson believes that public and private charity in New York City will have to provide between $30,000,000 and $35,000,000 during the coming winter.

In Chicago the principal charity organizations are joining to raise $8,800,000, or $3,800,000 more than was raised last year. In Cleveland $930,000 was spent for material relief in 1930, and Kenneth Sturges, general manager of the community fund, puts the corresponding total for 1931 at $2,640,000. It is expected that expenditures in 1932 will be as great or greater. To help meet them the voters of Cuyahoga County, 75 per cent of whose population lives within the Cleveland city limits, are being asked to approve a special 1-mill tax, which will provide $2,100,000 or more. St. Louis has spent about $750,000 on relief of the unemployed since October, 1929; between now and April 1, 1932, it is thought that another $1,000,000 will be required. In Cincinnati more than $1,000,000 has been spent to date, and it is unofficially estimated that at least as much will be needed this winter.

Substantially the same situation is reported in other cities. Seattle has spent $1,910,000; it will need $1,500,000 or more this winter. Baltimore will have spent about $1,000,000 during the calendar year of 1931; it will need at least $1,750,000 for 1932. Dayton spent $636,000 between October 1, 1929, and August 31, 1931; for the six months ending April 1, 1932, it will require $400,000. St. Paul spent $426,674 in 1930, will probably have spent $605,654 for the year 1931, and is expected to need $760,000 for 1932. Pittsburgh expended $2,000,000 from the beginning of the depression to August 31 last, and require $3,750,000 for the coming winter. Dallas spent $183,000 during a corresponding period and will spend $750,000 for the coming winter.

These estimates are, of course, important as ratios rather than as totals. It is the percentage of increase that reflects the real seriousness of the situation, as it is seen by those whose profession brings them closest to it. The next question is where the money needed is coming from—and, perhaps, whether it is coming at all. As the New Republic recently pointed out, more than 70 per cent of the relief funds are coming from public sources. In certain cities the percentage runs as high as 95. A few examples of big cities as well as little ones will show how much diversity there is. In Spokane private charity furnished $60,000 of the $300,000 spent up to October 1, 1931. It will be asked to give $50,000 for the coming winter—25 per cent instead of 20 per cent of the whole. Little Rock has raised $48,000 since October, 1929, with private charity furnishing $29,000 and the city government $19,000. It plans to raise $50,000 this winter, of which the city is expected to furnish only $3,000.

Five-eighths of Providence's total of $800,000 has come from private charity, but it is expected that private givers can furnish only $225,000 of the $600,000 required for the winter's needs. Dallas expects to get only $200,000 of the $850,000 needed from public funds. In Pittsburgh private charity furnished $1,371,200 out of $2,000,000 spent, and private sources are relied upon to furnish $3,500,000 out of the $3,750,000 needed this winter. St. Paul has steadily increased its use of tax money for relief, and the tentative estimate for 1932 calls for only $160,000 out of $760,000 to be furnished by private donations. Hartford is raising about $200,000 from private contributions and $550,000 from public funds. In Dayton private charity raised nearly half the relief fund expended to date, but the estimates for this winter give it a quota of only $150,000 out of a total of $400,000. Cincinnati has raised $700,000 by private gift and $400,000 by city and county appropriations. This winter it is expected that private charity will yield $250,000 and public funds $750,000. If the mill tax already mentioned is accepted by the voters of Cuyahoga County in November, 80 or 90 per cent of the relief funds needed in and around Cleveland may come from this one source.

One of the questions asked in the New Republic's questionnaire was, "Do you find any evidence that the sources of private charity are drying up?" The answers are pertinent at this stage of the discussion. On the whole, they are encouragingly negative. "All classes are giving more than ever," replies Director Harry M. Carey, of the Community Welfare Federation of Wyoming Valley. Others who replied gave such answers as: "Apparently not; our fall chest campaign will tell the story"; "Not at this moment"; "Not for relief, but much less willingness to support educational and preventive programs"; "Not yet"; "No; but years like this one make it difficult to raise money"; "No—on the contrary, some are eager to respond"; "Yes; even to the extent that collections on last year's pledges are extremely hard to make at this time."

One can not make statistics out of human emotions, and it is too early to make a guess as to whether the public will provide, through gift or taxation, enough to meet this winter's crisis. That actual starvation will be permitted is unthinkable, though it is depressingly not unthinkable that thousands will suffer from malnutrition, inadequate shelter, and insufficient clothing. But the question is how near private charity can come to carrying out the job it has undertaken, and, if private charity fails, how soon public charity can step in. Individualism is apparently scheduled to have full opportunity in the work of relief, just as it had full opportunity in producing the conditions which now make relief necessary. Will the experiment succeed? And, if not, how far will it be carried? On these points we can get very little light. We must suppose that the social workers who make estimates of coming needs are acquainted better than most of us with the usual forewarnings of those needs. But a social worker can not know to what extent, if any, business will revive during the next six months. Consequently the best estimates of the proportion of the national income which must be diverted to keep alive those who will have no incomes this winter are only guesses.

It is on those guesses that plans for relief have to rest. And these plans rest also, in so far as they are not governmental, on what part of their surplus individuals can and will give. "We are hopeful, but it will be hard work." "It will be hard to obtain." "We hope to raise approximately the amount. We have no assurance." "We feel optimistic." Prospects for raising the sums needed are "fair" or "good." Such are some of the comments made in answer to the New Republic's query, "What reasonable expectation is there that the balance necessary will be obtained?" The charitable organizations can not allow themselves to be pessimistic. Yet until the money is not only promised but actually in their bank accounts, they can not be sure that they are to have all they need.

The uncertainty of the situation might have been expected to raise doubts in the minds of social workers as to the adequacy of the present means of dealing with it. But there is a good deal of testimony to the contrary.

"I believe," writes Mr. David Armstrong, secretary of the Worcester Welfare Federation, "that there will be many people receiving aid for the first time in their lives now who will very readily develop an expectancy to be relieved the next time they have any difficulties. I believe that this expectancy would grow tremendously if there were a huge Federal appropriation that everybody knew about. I believe that the longer we can continue with the principle that each community should take care of its own, the better off the country will be as a whole."

"I am personally opposed to Federal aid for unemployment," declares Secretary Burt, of the Providence community fund. "I believe that this opinion is shared very largely throughout the State of Rhode Island." John F. Hall, of Seattle, would accept Federal aid "as a last resort," but adds:

"In our present unemployment crisis there has been evidence of a deepened sense of responsibility for all its people on the part of the local community. This social sense, or whatever you choose to call it, is the most promising foundation we have on which to build preventive and constructive measures to lessen unemployment. A Federal dole is likely to help establish relief as the answer to unemployment, whereas it should be considered only a makeshift."

One hardly needs to point out that the replies to the New Republic's questionnaire cover only the situation in the larger cities. They leave untouched the condition in the small towns and in rural areas. There are whole regions in the United States where, for one reason or another, distress is acute and relief agencies are either lacking or are inadequately financed and equipped. In the coal-mining areas in Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Kentucky many thousands of miners and their families are destitute partly because of strikes, partly because of low wages and irregular employment even among those who have continued at work. The same situation prevails among the textile workers, North and South. In the South, those dependent upon cotton for their livelihood are all but bankrupt. In the wheat-growing areas in the Northwest, one hears of farmers so hard up that in some counties in North Dakota, for instance, they have come together in mass meetings and agreed to pay no more interest on mortgages and other loans until times get better. In many other districts the droughts of 1930 and 1931, and this year's grasshopper plague, have caused tremendous suffering which will not be reached by the community chests or any other form of organized urban relief.

Another group which is beyond the reach of professional charity work is the thousands of unemployed men—and sometimes women—who take to the road, either in hope of finding a job somewhere else, or just drifting. Railroad men know what their problem is like, and a writer in a recent issue of Labor, the official organ of the brotherhoods, tells something of present conditions. He describes "veritable armies of migratory workers wandering from place to place, swarming over railroad trains, congregating in camps—'jungles' they are called—and trying desperately to maintain a miserable existence." This writer tells of a freight train in Utah recently which carried 92 persons, including 3 women and a baby. In view of the emergency, the old rules against carrying these "deadheads" have been relaxed, and from 60 to 200 on a train are not at all uncommon. The Denver & Rio Grande Railroad carried 11,000 such persons in July. The president of one road estimates that his line is killing two or more vagrant riders every day when these men, often weak from hunger or fatigue, slip off the brake beams or fall between the cars. Near Vancouver, a thousand or more "drifters" have congregated in a camp near the city, where lack of sanitation has caused an outbreak of typhoid and endangered the health of the whole community.

Returning to the statements of social workers on the general question of urban relief, let us quote for a final and striking analysis of the problem, Director Hodson, of the Welfare Council of New York City. Mr. Hodson believes in "Federal aid for unemployment relief under certain conditions and with certain safeguards." He continues:

"The primary responsibility for relief properly rests upon the local community. As to the ability of the local communities to meet this crisis, no one is in possession of the facts. There ought to be a survey of the financial condition of the cities and counties of the country to determine the present status of their tax-levying and debt-incurring powers. In those areas where these powers are exhausted the Federal Government will undoubtedly have to help; and if there are a substantial number of communities thus situated, it may be necessary to pass a general appropriation act. * * *"

The last question in the New Republic's list was, "Does the experience of this depression suggest any better way of dealing with the needs of the unemployed than that now practiced?" This brought out a number of constructive suggestions, with considerable emphasis upon unemployment insurance, or the creation of an unemployment reserve fund. The creation of a reserve by private charities was also proposed, and the establishment of permanent unemployment committees on the pattern which seems to have worked well in Rochester, N. Y. "Some protection should be devised for the workers," thinks Secretary Atwater, of St. Paul, "so that when you have an able-bodied person, willing to work, who can not find work, he does not have to suffer the indignity of relief subsistence." Director Hodson "is fully convinced that some kind of unemployment insurance is necessary if we are to mitigate for the future the hardships of unemployment," but points out that "such insurance is only palliative in the absence of national planning for industry and some improvement in our economic order." From but one city in the entire list of those from which answers were received did there come any note of entire satisfaction with the existing scheme of things. This was Charleston, S. C. "I believe," states Miss Georgia L. Jatho, of the Charleston community chest, "we have the problem fairly well solved. Should a dire emergency arise this winter, we will look to those in the higher scale of giving to come forward, which they have never failed to do if convinced."

What impression does one derive from the sum of these answers? Unmistakably those who have sent them are taking their jobs seriously. Yet, beyond the perception of the immediate task and the impending necessity, almost all are groping in the dark. Unemployment has to be treated as though it were what the insurance companies call an "act of God," not to be foreseen, not to be prevented, but to be dealt with as humanely and wisely as possible when it occurs. The social worker can not do otherwise. His position is analogous to that of a fireman in a community which has no fire-prevention laws.

But back of the social worker are communities, and back of the communities a Nation, not yet organized either to prevent unemployment or to deal with it adequately when it becomes a desperate problem. No one now doubts that the causes of economic depression are more than local and more than national. Yet, putting aside entirely the question of Federal aid, there exists no national body of information and no national pattern of action that can be brought to bear in this crisis. Perhaps we shall have both information and pattern before the next depression. For the present and for the coming winter we shall apparently rely on rule of thumb, preserving our individualism and our local independence, but allowing countless human lives to be broken because we did not, on a nation-wide scale, foresee and prepare.

R. L. DUFFUS.

FEDERAL RELIEF APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD an open letter addressed to the President of the United States on Federal relief appropriations, by Mr. William Hodson, executive director of the Welfare Council of New York City. The letter appears in the Survey Graphic, published in New York City, for November, 1931.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

OCTOBER 13, 1931.

Hon. HERBERT C. HOOVER,
President of the United States, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: You have given the country assurance that suffering among the unemployed will be prevented, so far as possible, and alleviated where prevention has failed. By bringing Mr. Gifford and his associates to Washington to assist in the fulfillment of that pledge you have afforded the country inspiring leadership to which people everywhere are responding with confidence and enthusiasm. Nevertheless there is a growing feeling that the Federal Government may have to do more than stimulate and coordinate local effort. Many persons close to the actual problem foresee the possibility that local funds may not be adequate to meet the great distress which is anticipated this winter and that Federal appropriations will be imperative. The thoughtful citizen whose mind is not yet made up on this question finds himself in doubt on two points:

1. Is it true that many localities are unable to provide the money needed for unemployment relief? Is there any substantial body of fact, other than the horseback opinions of officials and social-service administrators, upon which to base a judgment?

2. If outside aid must be provided, can a Federal appropriation be so administered as to avoid the dangers of "pork-barrel" legislation with its paralyzing effects upon local initiative and its uncertain benefits to the millions of needy persons who are the intended beneficiaries?

The purpose of this letter is to suggest that reliable data can be secured on the financial competence of the local communities which would help to inform and guide public opinion. Further, should supplementation prove to be necessary, a Federal appropriation can be wisely administered on the well-established principles of grants-in-aid such as have been successfully provided for education, roads, infant hygiene, and so forth. In this connection may I commend to your consideration the report of the Subcommittee on the Federal Government and Child Welfare of the White House conference of which I had the privilege of being chairman. This report, in discussing grants-in-aid, refers to them in part as follows: "It is the clear opinion of the subcommittee that grants-in-aid constitute a governmental technique peculiarly fashioned to the needs of the American people and nicely adjusted to the American governmental structure under the Constitution."

While this report was directed to Federal aid for child welfare its reasoning is pertinent to the not unrelated subject of unemployment relief. May I now deal more at length with the two points raised above and begin with the means of determining the adequacy of local funds.

The historic policy of America has been to regard the relief of suffering as a local responsibility. Each community ought to care for its own so long as it has the resources to do so, and under normal circumstances no other course of action would be suggested. However, it seems clear that in an emergency, history and tradition will not be permitted to stand in the way of meeting widespread human need, once the need has been demonstrated. It is a fact that, with few exceptions, communities have been slow to recognize the full effect of existing unemployment on their people and have delayed too long the planning of all-inclusive, community-wide programs of relief. Reliable information on the numbers of unemployed has not been available until recently, and it has been difficult to determine how many of those unemployed were without reserves and in need of outside assistance. Bread lines constitute a visible and dramatic sign of want, but they give the public a wholly false idea as to the character and extent of real destitution. It is not the homeless man in the bread line, but the family in the tenement and on the farm which is our chief concern. However, we are getting below the surface, more adequate community plans are now being made, and each locality is beginning to make more satisfactory estimates of its total relief needs.

When the estimated cost is arrived at, it will be met in two ways: From the public treasury and by private philanthropy. How far can these sources of funds be expanded to meet the emergency demands? Since approximately 70 per cent of relief expenditures throughout the country is provided out of the public treasury, it is reasonable to suppose that taxation rather than free gift must be our main reliance. Can the local governments increase their taxes or enlarge their bonded indebtedness in the required amount?

The answer to this question will be determined for each community by the margin between its present total annual cost of government and the total amount which it is permitted to raise annually by taxation and the issuance of bonds. In some communities there will be no margin, because tax rates and bonded debt are already up to the constitutional limits. In others there will be a small margin and in still others a substantial margin which can be made available for unemployment relief. What is greatly needed at the present time is a rapid but objective study of the financial status of local governments throughout the country. Reliable information can be secured only by independent inquiry—telegrams to mayors, governors, and governing boards will not answer the purpose. It is recognized that such an inquiry is a tremendous undertaking, but it is by no means impossible nor impracticable in view of the great human issues involved.

If after such investigation it appears that relatively few local governments are without power to provide their own relief funds, special means might be devised to help them without resorting to a general Federal appropriation. On the other hand, if it turns out that a very substantial number of localities in various parts of the country are unable to bear the load, we shall know that Federal aid on a broad scale is inevitable. In the long run private philanthropy can only supplement taxation—it can not be substituted for public funds as a source of revenue for unemployment relief.

If the resources of local governments prove to be inadequate, in a substantial sense, the problem then becomes one of establishing a satisfactory partnership between the Federal Government and the localities in providing unemployment relief. It is clear that the substitution of Federal funds and effort for local revenues and initiative would be a tragic mistake. The power of the Federal Treasury must be used to help the destitute communities outright, to aid the more prosperous localities according to the particular measure of their need, and to stimulate all the local governments to the utmost of which they are capable. We must establish a productive partnership which calls forth the best which the national and the local partners have to offer, thus swelling the total relief by the full contributions of each partner. If instead of this, millions of dollars are appropriated to be distributed on some rough measure of equity, like population, and without the most careful and discriminating type of administration, local effort will be paralyzed and the Federal Treasury will be substituted for the treasuries of the local governments, thus in the end decreasing the total available resources.

The distinction here is sharply illustrated by the difference between the way millions of dollars are ladled out to communities under the rivers and harbors appropriations and the wise expenditure of Federal money under grants in aid to stimulate local effort. In the former case the primary consideration seems to be that each locality shall get its share of the money available—a mere arbitrary division of a common equity. In the latter the gift is conditioned upon the locality providing sound education in agriculture, or building good roads, or rehabilitating disabled persons, or giving better care to mothers and babies. The more the locality does, the larger its share in Federal funds. The part of the Federal Government is to make its gifts of money a means of inspiring high standards of performance in the local communities.

As the report of the committee on the Federal Government and child welfare points out, the demonstrated advantages of Federal partnerships with the States through grants in aid are many, and the first one is that the principle of local administration of local affairs is preserved—there is no real danger of Federal bureaucracy. The initiative of the States is insured and their active acceptance of local responsibility encouraged by requiring them to match Federal appropriations with their own. Moreover, without jeopardizing local autonomy the Federal Government through its visitation and inspection can focus upon local administration the broad experience and expert knowledge of a central authority.

Grants-in-aid can be appropriately extended to unemployment relief and the difficulties of "pork-barrel" legislation avoided, provided broad authority coupled with wide discretion is vested in the administering Federal agency with only such general limitations and restrictions as experience with this type of aid has proved to be necessary and beneficial. Obviously, however, the usual requirement that the locality match Federal appropriations dollar for dollar must be modified by leaving the manner and amount of matching to the discretion of the administering authority.

Moreover, Federal money should be available for use in the localities for administrative purposes as well as for relief. There is a current notion that large relief funds will somehow administer themselves. Emergency committees are eager to announce that all their funds are for relief and that no part is used for administration. Yet every intelligent person knows that the history of relief throughout the world has been, until fairly recent times, a story of tragic waste where more harm than good frequently befell the beneficiaries. One reason for this result was the assumption that the distributing of funds to the needy did not require intelligence, experience, and wisdom coupled with human sympathy. Let us make no mistake in this emergency about the absolute necessity for competent administration with adequate personnel trained to its task. This applies both to the localities where relief is actually being dispensed and to the administering staff in Washington. The grants-in-aid provided in other fields have properly laid great stress on efficient execution of the law with as much safeguard against political interference in the choice of policies and personnel as is possible in this mundane world.

Mr. President, I offer all of the foregoing expressions of my personal opinion with some hesitation. Your high place of responsibility at the seat of government gives you knowledge and insight regarding the total situation which no citizen can possibly have. Moreover, it may seem gratuitous to offer suggestions to one of your distinguished service in relieving human distress in many parts of the world. However, it is given to you, out of your own unique experience, to provide the leadership which millions of suffering human beings await with a hope that holds despair in abeyance. Four fellow citizens appreciate the enormous responsibility which is yours, they understand your profound concern that suffering shall be reduced to a minimum, and they await your call to join in bold and constructive action for the public welfare.

Very respectfully yours,

WILLIAM HODSON,
Executive Director the Welfare Council of New York City.

INTERGOVERNMENTAL-INDEBTEDNESS ARTICLES BY SENATOR HOWELL

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD certain articles prepared by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] dealing with the question of the foreign debts and the present deficit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection it is so ordered.

The articles are as follows:

HUGE DEFICIT IN TREASURY LAID TO UNPAID WAR DEBTS—SENATOR HOWELL SAYS EUROPE'S FAILURE TO CARRY BURDEN SHIFTS IT ON UNITED STATES

(By ROBERT B. HOWELL, United States Senator from Nebraska, chairman of the Claims Committee. Written exclusively for Universal Service)

WASHINGTON, November 30.—A huge deficit—$1,800,000,000 plus. More taxes. This situation confronts the American people with the advent of this 1931 holiday season.

You will be told that it is all due to the business depression. That is an excuse. True, if there had been no business depression our Treasury might have been equal to the strain.

BLAME IS PLACED

But the fact is that this deficit and the resulting increase in taxes, now pending, are chargeable to the failure of European nations to shoulder the $12,000,000,000 plus of war debts they owed us.

As a consequence, we have had to shoulder these debts—because we borrowed and still owe every dollar we lent Europe.

Our interest charges on this account alone have been averaging $500,000,000 a year—and there is no such thing as a moratorium for us.

NATURAL QUESTION

"But," you may ask, "could these European nations pay?"

Last year these debtor nations spent some $1,600,000,000 on armaments, or about $430,000,000 more than was expended annually prior to the war.

We are indeed easy. When European negotiators came to Washington to settle their war debts, we did not insist on their agreeing to pay those debts in full, together with the interest we were paying because of them.

We did not even insist they should agree to pay such interest for a reasonable period of time, even though the principal sums of the debts were to be canceled. We complacently settled with them on this basis:

Their debts, exceeding $12,000,000,000—or, to be exact, $12,090,667,000—were canceled, the debtor nations agreeing merely to help us out in paying interest on the money we had borrowed to loan them. Yes; and all they are to pay, taken together, is 2⅝ per cent interest annually for 62 years on this $12,000,000,000. Then they are through. We must pay the $12,000,000,000 without help and also the difference between this 2⅝ per cent interest and the interest we are paying on the money we borrowed to loan them.

HOW FIGURES STAND

All they paid us last year was $235,000,000.

This year they were to pay us $247,000,000, about half the interest we must pay, but the proposed moratorium will shift this $247,000,000 to our shoulders, temporarily at least.

The net cost to us of carrying these debts from their dates of settlement up to the end of this proposed moratorium—less than eight years as an average—will exceed, in interest alone, the total payments of every kind and nature made by our European debtors by more than $2,369,000,000. Do you wonder a deficit has overtaken us?

YEARS OF SCHEMING

For years—beginning at most three weeks after the armistice—the chancelleries of Europe have schemed incessantly to bring about the total cancellation of these debts. The success achieved thus far has greatly heartened them.

Of course, this possibility has appealed tremendously to Premier MacDonald, of Great Britain; Premier Laval, of France; and Foreign Minister Grandi, of Italy, who, in turn, have recently visited President Hoover.

And now there are those—among them Premier MacDonald, according to press reports—who are confident that the President's moratorium will prove the hoped-for death knell of all future debt payments to the United States.

UP TO TAXPAYERS

In dollars and cents these $12,000,000,000 of debts plus interest deficits are equivalent to an empire, their total approximating the assessed value of Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, Idaho, Utah, Nevada, Washington, and Oregon. And so important to you, your children, and your children's children is even the partial interest, which the debtors have promised to pay, that you should ponder well and weigh each settlement that you may determine for yourself whether or not we shall insist upon Europe's continuing to help us pay interest on our huge borrowings because of these debts, or whether we shall further relieve these debtor nations by more reductions in the partial interest they have agreed to pay, or shoulder the whole burden ourselves.

ITALIAN DEBT

WASHINGTON, December 1.—Italy's war debt to the United States was $1,349,000,000. However, that is not all.

After the last gun was fired in the Great War our Secretary of the Treasury, like the good Santa Claus he was, kept right on loaning Italy as though the war were still on.

AUTHORITY QUESTIONED

He did stop long enough to ask the Finance Committee of the Senate to report out a bill approving such loans. This was refused. However, he continued making advances, though, so far as Italy was concerned, the Treasury did threaten to stop because of the attitude of an Italian representative at the peace conference who was insisting on a discussion of an all-around cancellation of intergovernmental debts.

This postwar debt amounts to $801,000,000, making Italy's total debt on June 15, 1925, $2,150,000,000 plus.

REMAINS UNPAID

Every dollar we loaned Italy was borrowed from our people and remains unpaid. As a consequence it will have cost the United States in interest to carry this Italian debt to the end of the present fiscal year—a period of seven years—some $624,000,000.

Now, mark you, should the proposed moratorium be ratified all Italy will have helped us out during that time—and she has paid all she agreed to pay—is a total of $39,821,000. The difference of the two sums will be our net cost of carrying this Italian debt for but seven years, or about $585,000,000.

Italy was to have paid us $14,706,000 more this year except for the proposed moratorium.

Could Italy have paid more? The following facts will answer that question:

In all, 14.3 per cent of her population is under arms. Last year she expended in armaments (military, naval, and air) $245,000,000, as against $142,000,000 in 1913—$103,000,000 more.

HER SETTLEMENT

Italy's debt settlement is equivalent to the cancellation of the principal sum of her debt of $2,150,000,000 and the ultimate payment in lieu thereof of 1⅛ per cent interest on the face of that debt for 62 years. Then Italy stops paying, the principal sum of her debt having been canceled.

Moratorium or no moratorium, should we do more for Italy? Is it not about time we should think of the people of the United States?

Why such a settlement? It was based on the high-sounding theory of ability to pay. There had to be some excuse for such indefensible generosity. The same theory was presumably invoked in the case of the Hungarian debt, and, though the amount involved was small, it will be discussed next, as the settlement indicates that the Debt Commission followed theory and a form of settlement to the point of absurdity.

HUNGARIAN DEBT

WASHINGTON, December 2.—Naturally there was nothing due from Hungary on account of advances made during the war, as she was aligned with our enemies. After the war supplies were afforded Hungary by the United States Government to the amount of $1,985,000.

Notwithstanding this was a postwar debt and the small amount thereof, a settlement was made with Hungary in the identical form of that with Italy.

THE AGREEMENT

It provided for the cancellation of the principal sum of $1,985,000 and in lieu thereof the payment of 3.7 per cent interest on the face of this debt for a period of 62 years, after which all payments are to cease as the principal sum of the debt is canceled.

For the period ending with this fiscal year it will have cost the United States Treasury to carry this debt $883,000 in interest alone, whereas the payments of Hungary for the period will total only $468,000. Therefore, should the proposed moratorium be ratified, the net cost of carrying this debt to the end of the present year will be about $415,000.

NO JUST REASON

There is no just reason why Hungary should not have paid this debt in full with 4¼ per cent interest within 25 years, as authorized and directed by Congress.

However, the Debt Commission seems to have been doing a routine job, so they applied the usual form of debt settlement, providing for cancellation, and charged it up to the ability-to-pay theory.

Had the Debt Commission insisted upon an additional annual payment by Hungary of only a quarter of a cent a year for each of Hungary's inhabitants for the 62 years, Hungary's debt would have been paid in full with 4¼ per cent interest and no cancellation whatever.

NO JUSTIFICATION

Is it to be wondered that deficits will develop with such treatment of our governmental credits and resources?

There is no justification for a moratorium in this case, and certainly after such generous treatment of a debtor suggestions of further reductions or of a total release should not be entertained.

BELGIUM'S DEBT

WASHINGTON, December 3.—Belgium's war debt, due the United States, totaled about $225,000,000. Belgium's postwar debt contracted after the termination of hostilities was about $258,000,000. The grand total of these two debts was $483,000,000.

Every dollar loaned Belgium was borrowed by us, our bonds still are outstanding, and they, together with interest, must be paid—the interest semiannually and the $483,000,000 some time in the future.

GOAT FOR EUROPE

The proposed moratorium is for all the war-worn nations except the United States. This is because every moratorium requires a goat, and so far as Europe is concerned, Uncle Sam has proven the champion goat of all time.

We borrowed money to lend these debtor nations. We must pay whether the debtor nations pay us or not. They are not to pay anything this year, if the proposed moratorium is ratified, and hope to pay nothing next year or thereafter.

THE END IS—WHERE?

There were those who realized we were the goat when the cancellation propaganda began shortly after the armistice. We took the second degree in this order at the time of the debt settlements, and a third degree is due with the moratorium. The question now is: How high will we consent to go in this "order of the goat"?

As a matter of fact, the Government has gone so far in its generosity to Belgium as to be guilty of a rank injustice to our people. That you may understand this, consider what the settlement with Belgium means to us in dollars and cents.

WHAT IT HAS COST SO FAR

Since 1925 up to the close of this fiscal year it will have cost the American people to carry Belgium's debt, in interest alone, about $140,000,000, and all Belgium will have paid us during these seven years, in case of a moratorium, will be less than $32,000,000.

In short, it will have cost us by next July, interest alone, since this debt settlement was concluded—over and above all Belgium's payments—$108,000,000. But that is not all. This settlement provides for the total cancellation of the debt's principal sum of $483,000,000.

ONLY A PROMISE

We are never to get a cent for that. It is gone. In lieu thereof, however, Belgium has promised to pay us the equivalent of 2⅛ per cent interest annually on the face of this debt for 62 years. Then Belgium is through, because, as stated, the principal sum of the debt—$483,000,000—has been canceled.

By the end of this fiscal year, then, we will have had to foot an interest-deficit loss of $108,000,000 plus $483,000,000 canceled, or a total loss of $591,000,000. Next year we will be out still more, and so on until the end.

However, last year Belgium had under arms more than 7 per cent of her population and was able to find in excess of $33,000,000 to expend on armaments.

AT THIS RATE

At this rate, during the seven years in question, Belgium will have spent on armaments alone $230,000,000.

Does it not seem as though she might have paid us more than $32,000,000 on her debt during this period, inasmuch as we will have had to pay out $140,000,000 in interest alone to carry it? Yet European chancelleries are hoping for further reductions, even complete forgiveness of their debts, because in the offing is the proposed moratorium.

RUMANIA'S DEBT

WASHINGTON, December 4.—Rumania won the war, if that could be said of any nation.

She entered it the size of Iowa, with three times its population. She emerged with added territory equal to Missouri, containing twice the population of that State.

FINE RESOURCES

A wonderful agricultural region, Rumania is in about the same latitude as Wisconsin, traversed by the Danube, touching on the Black Sea, supplemented with forests, fisheries, and great mineral resources—oil, coal, salt, copper, zinc, antimony, and lead.

Because of its resources and the relatively small size of its general war indebtedness—$267,000,000—Prince Bibesco, Rumania's minister at Washington, is reported to have urged his Government not to seek such cancellations as other debtors were demanding but to settle in full on a commercial basis.

Of course, this attitude was keenly resented by our other European debtors. It was, indeed, a bad example at a time when Uncle Sam had been reduced to a mellow, sentimental, and amenable state of mind, such that scarcely a holiday passed without his using the cancellation stamp for some one.

BIBESCO SHIFTED

Especially was this true of France, and, because of the close relations and military understandings between France and Rumania, Bibesco was promptly transferred to another post.

Rumania's debt to us was a relatively small amount, approximately $47,000,000. It will be remembered that Rumania was first aligned with the Allies and subsequently with Germany. As a consequence we made no loans to her during the war. All her debt to us was due to borrowings after 1918, and on account of surplus war supplies for the succor of Rumania's people during the reconstruction period.

Notwithstanding these facts, the Debt Commission canceled this debt upon Rumania's agreement to pay 3.4 per cent interest thereon for 62 years. Then Rumania is to be through. We never get a dollar of the principal sum of $47,000,000. It is gone.

Since 1925 this debt settlement has cost the people of the United States in interest alone some $13,000,000, inasmuch as every dollar loaned was borrowed by us and is still unpaid. However, should the proposed moratorium eventuate, during this same 7-year period, Rumania will have paid but $2,700,000—all she agreed to pay—leaving a net deficit for our people to shoulder of some $11,000,000, and the end is not yet.

ABSURD GENEROSITY

The absurdity of such generosity under the circumstances may be appreciated when we remember that at the time of this settlement West Virginia's share of our great war debt, based on population, was $266,000,000, or almost identical with Rumania's general war debt—$267,000,000. Yet Rumania has more than five times the area of West Virginia and nearly twelve times its population.

We are credited with being an opulent nation. Certainly such a debt settlement apparently stamps us a parvenu nation. Ostentatiously, forgetting the change, wasting our substance in dealing with our compeers, a compeer in this case with over 10 per cent of its population under arms, at an annual expense of some $64,000,000. Certainly this is not a case for further generosity or a moratorium.

GREAT BRITAIN'S DEBT

WASHINGTON, December 5.—The echo of the last gun fired in the Great War had scarcely died away when there was initiated in Europe a project for the cancellation of every one of the war debts due the United States.

It penetrated the chancelleries of that continent, it stalked to the peace table, it reached across the Atlantic and clasped hands with our international bankers, it intrigued our trade associations and chambers of commerce, it instituted an all-enveloping propaganda that worked while many of us slept.

PROJECT TRIUMPHS

Following such a barrage, the British Debt Commission finally arrived in Washington, and the cancellation project, remarkable as it may seem, largely triumphed.

The British settlement provides for cancellation, except that for 62 years Britain is to help us pay interest on the money we borrowed to lend her—and then Britain is through. This was justified on that new, high-sounding theory of "ability to pay."

Then followed the debacle—provisions for a similar cancellation of every other foreign debt due us, the ability-to-pay theory working in favor of certain nations, but when its application would have been favorable to the United States it was forgotten, evidently upon the ground that having canceled Britain's debt, that of our strongest debtor, we could hardly ask any other nation to accept less favorable terms.

KEPT ON LOANING

Britain's debt due to war-time loans was $3,110,000,000. After hostilities ceased we continued right on loaning her, so that her postwar debt was $1,605,000,000. The total of these war and postwar debts was $4,715,000,000—more than four thousand seven hundred millions of dollars—so huge a sum that the mind can hardly sense it.

In our settlement with Great Britain we agreed to forgive our debtor—to shoulder this huge debt in her place, provided she would pay us annually 3.7 per cent interest on its face for a period of 62 years. Then Britain is to be through.

So we have kissed good-by to $4,715,000,000. It's dead horse for us. But that is not all. Every dollar loaned Britain we borrowed, we still owe, and are paying interest thereon.

As a consequence, should the proposed moratorium be approved by Congress, we will have paid by next July, in interest alone, to carry Britain's debt some $513,000,000 more than Britain will have paid us altogether since the British debt settlement in 1923.

Under any circumstances, however, our loss in principal and interest, on account of this debt alone, will exceed five thousand millions by the end of this year—more than 90 per cent of which we are yet to pay out of future taxation. Moreover, there are further interest losses to come.

MORE SCALING

Notwithstanding these facts, there is propaganda abroad urging further scaling of Britain's promised interest payments and still other propaganda for a total release; to say nothing of applause for the proposed moratorium.

EIGHT POSTWAR DEBTS

WASHINGTON, December 6.—There are eight nations among Uncle Sam's debtors, no one of which except Poland is a beneficiary of German reparations—and Poland for only $120,000 a year. Nevertheless, under the proposed moratorium, each and all are to be relieved of any debt payments to the United States during the present fiscal year.

These nations are Austria, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Finland, Hungary, Lithuania, Latvia, and Poland. No one of them is indebted for any war-time advances. Their loans were made after the termination of hostilities, for other than war purposes.

TOTAL THREE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-EIGHT MILLIONS

Their respective debts at the time of settlement ranged from something less than $2,000,000 in the case of Hungary to Poland's debt of $182,000,000, totaling altogether some $378,000,000.

There was much discussion at the time as to whether the Treasury was legally empowered to make these loans because of the limitations contained in the Liberty Loan Act. Then, too, an appeal to the Finance Committee of the Senate for the broadening of the Treasury's authority fell on deaf ears.

POLITICAL MOTIVE

These advances were urged to mitigate suffering and unemployment. However, there was suggested another purpose in the official correspondence of that period. In a communication to the Treasury Department, of December, 1918, from the special United States commissioner of finance in Europe, Mr. Norman H. Davis, afterwards financial adviser to President Wilson and the American commission to negotiate peace, it was stated:

"From the Treasury's standpoint it is advisable, of course, to cut off as soon as possible our advances to the allied governments. But, on the other hand, from a political standpoint, it may be advisable not to cause too much anxiety just before the peace conference."

Notwithstanding the questioned authority for making these loans and our generosity in extending aid, every one of them has been canceled, the debtor nations agreeing to pay in lieu of the $378,000,000 the equivalent of a mere 3½ per cent annually on this sum for a period of 62 years.

DEBT CANCELED

That is all. The debts are canceled.

Not only must the American people pay this $378,000,000, but in addition an interest deficit every year, the difference between 3.5 per cent and the interest we must pay, and are now paying, on the money we borrowed to loan them.

From the time of these debt settlements up to the close of the present fiscal year it will have cost the people of the United States to carry this $378,000,000 the sum of $129,000,000 in interest alone.

However, should the proposed moratorium become a fact, the total that will have been paid by the seven nations during the same period will be less than $46,000,000.

Thus, our loss to July of next year would total this $378,000,000 plus an interest deficit of $83,000,000, or $461,000,000. Moreover, this loss will keep on increasing from year to year.

NEED NO MORATORIUM

The agreements settling these debts provide for the postponement upon request of interest and principal-sum payments. This right is effective now in the case of six of these debtors. However, none has formally applied for such relief to date.

In view of these facts and the generosity of which they are already the beneficiaries, should we volunteer that they pay us nothing this year, though we are confronted with a $1,800,000,000 deficit, which may be increased to $2,500,000,000 by the end of this fiscal year?

No private creditor would think of such a suggestion.

FRENCH DEBT

WASHINGTON, December 7.—Our entry into the great war was preceded by desperate appeals for aid from those who subsequently became our allies.

To save France from the invader we landed 2,000,000 young men upon her shores. However, their equipment and supplies were refused entry without the payment of French tariffs.

PAID RENT IN TRENCHES

War or no war, sentiment did not interfere with the French Government's business. The matter was adjusted by our agreeing to sell nothing during our stay in France.

Of course encampments for our boys were necessary, and trenches where they fought and died. However, for these we paid rent and damages. Such is the back stage and irony of war.

When the conflict was over our boys returned save their fallen comrades, but there remained behind our railroad equipment and the improvements we had made, besides mountains of food and other supplies.

Unfortunately for us, however, because of our agreement respecting tariff duties, there was but one customer for these "left overs"—the French Government.

PROMISES REPUDIATED

Therefore this $2,000,000,000 worth of property was turned over to France for promises to pay $400,000,000, since canceled.

Prior to the armistice, while the enemy was driving on Paris, we loaned, upon the solemn promise of France to repay, tremendous sums, aggregating at the time of her debt settlement $2,662,000,000.

But that is not all. After the war was over, upon her pleadings for further assistance, her debt was increased by further loans, including property purchased and interest, to a total of $4,231,000,000.

France with great reluctance finally ratified a debt settlement which provided:

1. For wiping off the slate this debt of $4,231,000,000; that is, its cancellation.

2. For the payment in lieu thereof of 2⅛ per cent of the face of this canceled debt annually for 62 years; France then to be free and clear of all obligations to the United States. (See interperative resolution respecting French debt settlement adopted by United States Senate June 19, 1929.)

SHIFTED TO TAXPAYERS

This means the shifting of the payment of this $4,231,000,000 from France to the shoulders of our people.

Moreover, from the date of this settlement to the end of the present fiscal year—should the proposed moratorium be ratified—it will have cost the American people to carry this debt, in interest alone, $1,228,000,000.

In the meantime, however, the payments made by France—and she has paid all she agreed to pay—will total but $200,000,000, resulting in a net interest deficit or loss of $1,028,000,000 for the seven years.

Thus will the American people be out of pocket, so far as this French debt is concerned, approximately $5,260,000,000. Moreover, in years to come this huge loss will increase, bending the backs of American children yet unborn.

PHILIPPINE-INDEPENDENCE STATEMENT BY SENATOR HAWES

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, the population of the Philippine Islands consists of 13,000,000 Malays and less than 7,000 Americans. The Malay population is rapidly increasing, while the American population is decreasing. These remaining Americans considering their personal interest, are naturally opposed to the independence of the islands. It is asserted by them, and the assertion is transmitted to American newspapers and the American public, that the Filipino people do not understand the responsibilities of independence or the consequences of the withdrawal of the sovereignty of the United States from the islands.

This statement is without foundation. Very intelligent discussions showing a full realization of economic readjustments which may become necessary in case independence is granted, have been carried on by some highly intelligent men and women of the Philippines. They have weighed the cost and are willing to pay the price, if there is any.

The assertion that the costs and responsibilities of independence have not been considered is just another attempt to divert the attention of the American people from the real facts as they exist in the Philippines. All classes of Filipinos are united for independence—the business, intellectual, labor, and agricultural elements.

A remarkable convention called "The First Independence Congress" was held at Manila from February 22 to February 26, 1930. It was composed of 3,000 delegates representing every section of the Philippine people, geographically, economically, politically, and in a religious way, for Catholics, Protestants, Mohammedans, and pagans attended it. These 3,000 delegates divided their subjects of independence into subtopics and assigned men and women to discuss a particular subject and to report back to the convention.

I have read very carefully the volume of 365 pages containing a report of this convention. As the chronicle of an effort of thousands to acquire an intelligent understanding of independence, it is a remarkably human document, notable for moderation of statement, for the friendly words with which the delegates spoke of the United States, and its people, for the clear understanding of the responsibilities of nationhood, and for insight into the problems the future holds for them. This document will demonstrate that the matter has been discussed and the effect of independence carefully considered. Despite the responsibilities the unanimity of opinion for freedom remains.

The text of the resolution adopted by the delegates, and some paragraphs from addresses at the gathering I think well worth a place in the RECORD. I ask that the following extracts from the proceedings of this convention be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolutions and extracts are as follows:

The resolution adopted by the convention reads:

"We, members of the First Independence Congress, convened at the city of Manila, Philippine Islands, from February 22 to 26, 1930, on the initiative of private citizens, and composed of representatives of business and agriculture, directors of civic organizations, leaders in the various professions, publicists, educators, labor, religious and student leaders, municipal presidents, Moro chiefs, coworkers of Rizal and Del Pilar in Spain, veterans of the revolution, elective officials of the provincial governments, high officials of the former Philippine Republic, past and present members of the Philippine Legislature and Filipino members of the council of state, after deliberating upon the problems of independence including national defense, finance, and economics, as well as political, social, and educational questions which would be faced by an independent Philippines, hereby make the following declaration:

"'While fully conscious of the debt of gratitude we owe to America for her benevolent policy in the Philippines, we are convinced that immediate independence is the only solution in consonance with the unalterable desires of the Filipino people. No matter how lightly an alien control may rest on a people, it can not, it will not, make that people happy. The genius and potentialities of the Filipino people can only be developed in an atmosphere of freedom unrestrained by foreign rule. Differences in race, history, and civilization render difficult, if not impossible, a common life under one flag between the American and Filipino peoples.

"'The uncertainty of our future political status hampers the economic development of the country. Our present trade relations with the United States are not conducive to the economic independence of the Philippines, and whatever may be the temporary advantages of such relations, we are willing to forego them for the sake of freedom. The longer we remain under America, the harder will it be for us to be freed from our political and economic dependence on her. We are now better prepared for nationhood than many independent states of to-day, and we are ready to assume the risks and responsibilities of independence. We are not unmindful of the fact that in the final solution and settlement of the Philippine problem, American and foreign interest must be adequately safeguarded. The establishment of a Philippine Republic to-day will but be the logical and just outcome of our long struggles for freedom and will be in keeping with America's history and traditions. Independence will make for closer friendship and better understanding between America and the Philippines, while retention fosters distrust and ill feeling. In our solemn constitutional covenant with America she has promised to grant us independence as soon as a stable government can be established. This condition has long been fulfilled.

"'Therefore, in the name and in behalf of the Filipino people, we solemnly affirm, with full realization of the consequences and responsibilities of political independence, that our people should be allowed to live an independent life and to establish a government of their own without any further delay and without any condition which makes its advent uncertain; hence we respectfully reiterate our petition to the people and Government of the United States to grant the Philippines immediate, complete, and absolute independence.'"

Dean Maximo M. Kalaw, executive secretary, in opening the convention, said: "The idea was started by private citizens; but when we urged our legislative leaders to carry it out because they are the legal representatives of the people, we were told that, in order to give freshness to the movement and to attract other men and parties, citizens outside of active politics had better take the initiative. In that way, they further argued, the people of the United States would know that the independence agitation here is not limited to the political leaders. This is the explanation for the calling of this congress merely by a group of citizens."

The president of the congress, the Hon. Felipe Agoncillo, reminded us—and the world—of our pledge: "We avail ourselves of the birthday of the immortal Washington, the founder of the great North American Republic, and on this day request the Government of the United States to give us the immediate fulfillment of the solemn promise made in the preamble of the Jones law. It is a word of honor which America has given before the world, and because it is jealous of its national honor should in no way elude its fulfillment."

Hon. Antonio de las Alas, speaker pro tempore of the house of representatives, said: "In the Philippines we are fortunate that we can always invoke the history and traditions of America to keep alive our sentiments of nationalism and accelerate its onward march. The facts still linger in our minds that the Pilgrims emigrated to America to enjoy freedom; that the Boston Tea Party was a protest against acts done by the British Government without the consent of the American colonists; that though few, ill-fed, barely clothed, poorly armed, and untrained for military duties, the Revolutionary Army under Washington continued fighting with might and main to attain the independence of America; that the Declaration of Independence lays down the ideal of government with the consent of the governed; that the Monroe doctrine was promulgated to close the American Continent from colonization by European nations; that the Civil War was fought to give life and blood to the tenet that all are born free and equal; that the Spanish-American War was fought to save Cuba from further atrocities; and that America participated in the last Great War to make the world safe for democracy and to compel each nation, including the small ones, to respect the rights of others."

Mrs. Rosa L. Sevilla de Alvaro, on behalf of the Filipino women, fairly characterized the methods the Filipinos have employed in pursuit of their ideal: "We, the women, are the first to condemn all violent measures, because no longer are we in the age of the cave man, when right by might was necessary to enforce the law of righteousness, and because we have more powerful and persuasive weapons. And all those who prove themselves hostile to our legitimate aspirations, let them be ostracized to indifference and isolation. We are happily in a period in which reason predominates, in which in the struggles for principles and ideals he who has faith in himself and in his own convictions triumphs; wherein the man who knows how best to present the facts succeeds, the man who knows how to find the most opportune means, who knows how to employ the weapon of persuasion attracts toward him the favorable opinion of other altruistic peoples; in short, the man who knows how to enhance virtue and paint even the defects of his people is the man who will finally attain victory.

The Hon. Juan Sumulong, at that time minority floor leader in the Philippine Senate, impressed on the delegates: "We do not aspire to be free on mere sentimentalism. We are convinced that in the degree of development reached by our country, the uncertainty of its definite political status is a positive obstacle to all real and durable progress. While the indefiniteness subsists, while it is made and planned, our country will suffer from the evils of provisionality; timidity and vacillation will be the characteristic decisions of the nation and foreign enterprises; our commerce with the exterior will be restrained and limited; and the whole country, oppressed by the darkness of the future, will continue to be like a man waiting for an unknown sentence which may give him back his liberty or deprive him of it forever."

The Hon. Sergio Osmena, president pro tempore of the Philippine Senate: "* * *; let each Filipino look for the job which fits his aptitude and let him do what he can for the benefit of the ideal. Our exact comprehension of the responsibilities, problems, and sacrifices which will bring independence will educate our intelligence and our character and will prepare us to be worthy of receiving it, and, above all, it will teach us to uphold and support it for us and for our children; for the natives and for the strangers; for all men of good will who want to live with us and who consider it an honor and a security to be under our flag. Determination, disinterestedness, the spirit of discipline, are qualities which, when united together in our case, will firmly conquer all obstacles."

An educator of distinction—Prof. Conrado Benitez, director of the school of business administration of the University of the Philippines—gave a glimpse of Filipino aptness: "First, in the early days of that contact, the appeal to able and ambitious Filipinos was to prepare themselves for participation in the government. That appeal met with a ready response, and soon there were not enough offices in the government for all those prepared for the public service. In recent years the appeal has been for the able Filipino to enter the field of business."

The Hon. Miguel Unson, secretary of the department of finance, said: "In June, 1909, when the United States Congress was considering the Payne-Aldrich bill, several agents of the government were traveling through the Provinces securing signatures to a petition which was to be solemnly adopted on the Luneta on July 4 of that year. The petition was for free trade between the United States and the Philippine Islands and the purpose of the petition was to offset the attitude of the Philippine Assembly, which was opposed to the bill. I know of many persons who refused to sign the petition because they considered that free trade would in time become a powerful tie binding the Philippines to the United States. They feared that economically the Philippines would become very dependent upon the American market, and that this dependence might in time grow to such an extent that the Filipino people might forget their duties toward their country in order to continue enjoying the material comforts and prosperity offered to their efforts by a market of almost unlimited possibilities."

The Hon. Rafael Alunan, Secretary of the Department of Agriculture and National Resources, called attention to problems and difficulties which some opponents of independence declare the Filipino either doesn't perceive or wish to mention: "The sensible people of the Philippine Islands can congratulate themselves that the leaders of public thought have realized the necessity of giving due attention to the economic aspect of the independence problem. One must admit that a free and independent existence necessarily brings with it many and serious economic problems. These are practical facts that have to be faced resolutely, because, like individuals, nations can not live on illusions. A person who, like the ostrich, hides his head when any difficulty or danger is encountered, does not exhibit constructive statesmanship. There are two dangers involved in the solution of the Philippine problem; the first consists in our closing our eyes to the economic difficulties which are a necessary consequence of independence, attempting to ignore their existence. The second is to insist upon seeing things as we would like them to be or think they ought to be, but are not in reality because they have bad sides as well as good."

Don Leopoldo R. Aguinaldo, a business man, and president of the Philippine Chamber of Commerce, said: "Independence can not and should not obstruct the increase of our productive wealth. But as our production depends for its consumption greatly on the outside markets, especially that of the United States, the cessation of political relations would provoke a disturbance in the commercial relations bordering on economic chaos which may last five years or more until necessary adjustments are made to supply the absorbing demands of the market in the States and other foreign markets which we may favor with our products. We should not form the illusion that our economic structure will not be affected with the transition of the actual state of dependence to a life without a check."

The Hon. Guillermo Gomez, Under Secretary of the Department of Finance, also foresaw and foretold some of the offsets to independence: "But there is no doubt that we can survive and even progress, if we know how to bear sacrifices and find the means of lowering the cost of production; contenting ourselves with smaller salaries and profits; introducing more scientific and economical methods in cultivation and harvesting, and uniting our efforts and cooperating with each other in looking for a more remunerative outlet for our crops; in a word, working harder than ever with our brains and brawn, so that we may successfully pass through the period of test, resulting from our emancipation, a test which will aggravate the unfortunate coincidence of the restrictions to be placed on our market in America with the superabundance of tropical products throughout the world."

The Hon. Cornelio Balmaceda, of the Bureau of Commerce and Industry, spoke in the tenor of Under Secretary Gomez: "The present free trade is a serious obstacle to Philippine independence. It has tightened and is tightening the commercial ties that bind us with the United States, and the longer we keep on with it the more economically dependent upon the ruling nation we shall become, and the more difficult it will be to sever our political relations with her. We must, therefore, work at once for the abolition of the free trade. But in order to make this necessary change in our tariff system less disturbing to our economic situation, and to mitigate to some extent the economic shock that it would cause to our people, we should see to it that its abolition is effected gradually, if such an arrangement can be secured. A period of 10 years may be fixed within which the present tariff arrangement may be abolished. After the first two years we can shift to a preferential tariff arrangement with the United States instead of free trade."

The Hon. Jose P. Laurel, member of the Philippine Senate: "Upon the workings of the government of these local units depends in a great measure the success or failure of the central government. This is especially true in a democracy. Paralyzation of the parts will result in the paralyzation of the whole. Sound municipal administration is the main prop of a state. It was M. de Toqueville who said: 'Local assemblies of citizens constitute the strength of free nations. Town meetings are to liberty what primary schools are to science; they bring it within the people's reach, they teach men how to use and to enjoy it. A nation may establish a system of free government, but without the spirit of municipal institutions it can not have the spirit of liberty.' Here in the Philippines, if we mean to preserve for future generations the stable government which we have built up, we must maintain a high standard of local government and administration. * * * I do not believe there will be serious opposition to the idea of increasing taxation here if that is necessary for the maintenance of an independent government. We should be willing to pay the price of liberty. Of course, in working out our financial program for the provinces and municipalities we should at the same time study the ways and means by which the expenses of the governments of these political subdivisions could be reduced to the minimum without, however, hampering public business. It is possible that we could bring down administrative expenses of our provincial and municipal governments by the reduction of their personnel."

The Hon. Honorio Ventura, secretary of the department of the interior: "It will be sufficient for me to state once more that our country has until now responded to all calls of duty as regards public order, obedience to law, and respect for the rights of nations and foreigners, and has at all times furnished the cooperation and services necessary for the maintenance of the constituted government and required by the public welfare not only as an element subordinate to a foreign authority or supreme power but as a factor indispensable to national existence with moral and material powers and responsibilities of its own."

Dean Maximo M. Kalaw spoke thus for the political section of the First Independence Congress: "Finally the independence question itself is the greatest deterrent to the political development of the Philippines. So long as that question remains unsolved real political progress is practically impossible. Every other political issue is overshadowed by independence and no real party system is developed. Independence has been the one major issue of Philippine politics ever since our first election. * * * Under the circumstances, therefore, no real party system can exist and no other issues can become prominent enough aside from the issue of independence. * * * It is conceded that there are many other Philippine problems of political nature which must be studied and solved for the proper political development of the country. There is the problem of the system of government to be established. There is the problem of the relation between the central and the local governments. There is the problem of corruption in the government. There is the problem of elections. * * * In order, therefore, that the people may cultivate proper respect and loyalty for the State, in order that they may develop self-reliance and self-sacrifice, in order that they may follow their own ideas and establish the forms of government adapted to their needs, in order that they may discuss freely their own political problems unmixed with the independence question, and in order that they might develop a proper attitude of vigilance and self-criticism toward their political leaders and social institutions, it becomes necessary that the independence question be solved and be solved immediately. * * * A real love for American institutions will blossom in a Republic born out of the generosity of the American people. The Philippine Republic will be the greatest monument to America in this part of the globe. It will be a veritable lamp which will be seen and admired from all corners of Asia."

The Hon. Lope K. Santos: "The teaching of English began about a month after the military occupation of Manila in 1899. Then the first teachers, who were Army men, taught the language through Tagalog or Spanish, which at the time they learned from their already adult pupils. During those first years the educational authorities were more inclined to the method of teaching English with the help of the dialects and even of Spanish; a practice which lasted only a couple of years. Men are not wanting who attribute the substitution of this method by the exclusive teaching of English to the suggestion of the Filipinos themselves, who were then taught to be 'leaders' of peace to the Filipino people and advocated the annexation to the United States. The new system, even if it was notoriously antipedagogical, prevailed and was instituted as a general policy of education in the whole country up to the present, consequently proscribing from the public schools any Filipino language or dialect, including Spanish. All the attempts on the part of our national 'leaders' and of our legislature, as well, to alter such a policy, have always come into conflict with a previous opposition or with the posterior disapproval of the executive. * * * The same Filipinos, in order to cooperate faithfully and sincerely with the American teachers, have gone on qualifying themselves with marvelous rapidity with the object of assuming the mission of teaching English; in such a way that actually they already have in their charge all the primary and intermediate schools, and the same is true with 95 per cent of the high schools and even universities."

The Hon. Rafael Palma, president of the University of the Philippines: "We have to prepare our youth not only for professions but also for the civil service, the national defense, and the diplomatic relations. Materials which are of little importance now in our course of study because of our dependent status would increase in weight with the change of situation. For instance, all courses pertaining to tariffs, immigration, monetary systems, disposal of public lands and mines, which by the nature of our relations with the United States are of secondary interest at present would come to the front of our educational problems. * * * The present era is eminently scientific, and we can not reasonably live and survive by isolating ourselves in our own islet formed during the theological era. We need to absorb and assimilate whatever else is of benefit to us. That is the law, the task of all education and progress. From the moment that the individual ceases to absorb new ideas or try new experiences, he stops growing intellectually."

Dean Francisco Benitez, of the College of Education, University of the Philippines: "For the last 50 years at least, the fundamental concern of our people has been and is the struggle for the achievement of independent nationhood. After these years of efforts, our people to-day, an impartial observer will see, are as well prepared for it as any other people in the world that at present aspire for their independence. Ours is, in the first place, a homogeneous people, possessed of the same culture that has been the result of Malayan, Hindu, Chinese, Spanish, and American influences, able to communicate with one another in English and Spanish, the overwhelming majority of us being Christians united by a long history of sacrifices for liberty and, thanks to the liberal policy of America, enlightened in the principles of good government and democracy. An impartial observer will further notice that the mind of our people is irrevocably made up on this question, not because we are ungrateful to the United States, but because we realize that on account of fundamental differences in race and history and of our geographical situation our people must work out their own destiny as a nation and in that way contribute their share to human progress and welfare. * * * With independence we will be more conscious of our responsibilities and obligations as well as of our rights as an independent and self-respecting unit in the family of nations, and, with independence, there will be in our country a renaissance, a new determination to do and achieve all those things which will enable us not only to maintain and to foster progress and welfare among us but to discharge all those duties that a civilized people owe to mankind. And as our civilization is the product of the influences of both the East and the West, we hope, as an independent nation, to contribute to a better understanding between the eastern and western nations."

The Hon. Angel Arguelles, director of the bureau of science: "A tropical country like the Philippines requires a highly developed organization to take care of the hygiene and sanitation of the people. Up to about 30 years ago, life in the Tropics was considered extremely hazardous in view of the fact that epidemic diseases like cholera, bubonic plague, smallpox and others may break out at irregular intervals. In those days when medical science was not fully harnessed to cope with the situation, a considerable proportion of the population became decimated because of the ravages of disease in one form or another. Fortunately, the great advances of science along this direction have made tropical life much more enjoyable and safe than in previous years. However, science must struggle on in combating the different types of epidemic diseases which confront people living in the Tropics. It will be the part of wisdom to closely keep abreast with the progress of sanitation and hygiene in order that our population can grow normally and with vigor and strength. The importance of this work is so self-evident that its necessity need not be emphasized."

Prof. Fabian de la Rosa, director of the School of Fine Arts, University of the Philippines: "Only a Philippines completely free and independent can reflect in art a pure and polished image of its native soul, thus providing its artists moments of intense and sane happiness, which will serve as a stimulant to their souls to create work of superior quality, where will be seen reproduced the effects that an atmosphere of liberty can generate in the will and sensibility of the artist; because, say what you will and think what you will, a controlled country is found constantly exposed to suffer great moral and material changes to the detriment oftentimes of its good native qualities, which means little or nothing to the ruler that always feels more interested in what concerns itself than in things belonging to the controlled country."

The Hon. Mariano H. de Joya, formerly judge of the Court of First Instance: "The diversity of races, religions, idioms, laws, institutions, and customs, however, is not an obstacle to the formation of a great, free, and prosperous state so long as its basis be liberty. The ties that bind actually the 120,000,000 inhabitants of the vast territories of the United States of America can not be more artificial—men belonging to all races, professing an infinity of religious and political creeds, subject to diverse systems of legislation, with customs and traditions of all the circuits of the earth; but, in spite of all that, they constitute the greatest and most powerful nation of the world, where all the hatred and injurious rivalries are drowned, because they are firmly united by the same cause of liberty by the heat of which all nationalities are melted. On the other side of the Atlantic exists also the prototype of the great American Republic—the Swiss Confederacy—whose inhabitants, notwithstanding their diversity of races, religions, and languages, have succeeded in establishing a free, happy, and prosperous state, the union of which was made possible by their community of interests and by the same ideals, sacrifices, and tribulations, from the most ominous days of its past bloody history to the attainment of liberty."

Mr. Pedro Aunario: "The great surprise which we had in the hecatomb of ninety-eight, which brought the United States to these islands, was that we Filipinos knew little of the Americans, of their history, and their character. That even caught us entirely unaware. Neither the country nor the then directors were prepared to face the new situation. * * * I shall tell you frankly that the clearer idea of relations of neighborhood I have condensed in the magnificent advice that an old man with good common sense and experience gave to his son, 21 years old. 'Try,' said the father, 'to have good relations with those around you and those near your home. If you can not gain the friendship of even your neighbors, you are unfit to live in the world. Do not allow others to interpret their purposes and then communicate them to you. Make an effort to understand them talking to them directly. If they are your possible enemies, you will know how to defend yourself better. Under any circumstances, if their house burns, yours too will; and when you are afflicted by a common misfortune, you would need mutual help.'"

Gen. Jose Alejandrino, ex-general of the revolution and ex-senator: "Finally, I believe that the best guaranty of our existence as an independent nation should be a stable government, honorable, efficient, and just but worthy, whose acts inspire confidence with other nations, and which proceeds in such a way that in all questions that might arise between our government and that of another nation, we can always prove before the world that reason and justice are on our side."

The Hon. Filemon Perez, secretary of the department of commerce and communications: "If the realization of our political ambitions is really approaching, if it is true that there gleam in the horizon rays of hope and that finally the Filipino people will be given the opportunity to live under their own determination, this is the moment of shaking and strengthening the civic conscience among our citizens. We should separate when we treat of public questions from party or regional considerations, in order to give preference to the common good. Let us go up so that from there we can have a more complete and comprehensive perspective of our national necessities and conveniences."

The Hon. Jose P. Melencio, representative of the Province of Cotabato, and son-in-law of General Aguinaldo: "That Mindinao is my subject to-day. Out of the uncertainties of yesterday, the ramparts of a better order are there being constructed. On all sides evidence of a quickened existence are discernible. The cross and the crescent are not inconsistent there. Good-naturedly, they smile on each other, marching hand in hand as friends and comrades. Some day, perhaps one of them will be discarded altogether; the more fit will survive. But there will be no actual clashes due to religious convictions and impulses. More noteworthy yet, Christians and Mohammedans, every now and then, go to the marriage altar together, to be there united by the compelling dictates of their hearts. In no case yet has one of those marriages hit the rocks of disaster. There are other encouraging signs of the times. Our Mohammedan kinsmen are steadily embracing the ways of modernity. Age-old prejudices and antiquated traditions are gradually being dumped into the scrap heap, and a new outlook toward life is manifest everywhere. More and more, faster and faster, they are adopting the trappings of modern civilization. Their wants are increasing; they are beginning to produce more. They are fond of riding in motor cars. They enjoy the movies. They get the same thrill out of athletics and of boxing bouts as we do. Many of them are fitting their picturesque vintas with motors so they can travel about faster. * * * American and foreign capital, on the other hand, hesitates to make large investments in Mindanao because of the uncertain political status of our country. With the coming of independence we shall have to rely on Filipino capital and initiative for the development of Mindanao. But the government would have to extend the necessary encouragement in order to achieve something tangible. It will have to provide roads, shipping and docking facilities, and various means of communication from one place to another. Once these things are provided for, the rest will take care of itself."

Director Ludovico Hidrosollo, of the bureau of non-Christian tribes, laid one of the ghosts with which foes of Filipino freedom are wont to frighten timid Americans: "Mindanao is populated with Christian, Mohammedan, and pagan peoples. Only two of the eight Provinces which compose the island are predominantly Mohammedan. These are Lanao and Cotabato. The Sulu Archipelago, which has a total area of 1,030 square miles, is almost entirely Moroland. According to the latest estimates, there are only about 6,000 Christian Filipinos in this Province. * * * Christianity and Mohammedanism do not harmoniously mix in any part of the world. In religion most men take things for granted rather than exercise reason. Fortunately, the Christian and Mohammedan elements of the population in Mindanao and Sulu have managed to live together peacefully as a whole. In the annual report of the governor of Lanao for 1928, I find these remarks: 'The least that is said about the differences between Christians and Mohammedans and the more effort that is put forth to establish and maintain friendly relations the more speedy will these differences, to a considerable extent, imaginary, be removed, and the relationship of man to man, give and take, live and let live, be established.' In my opinion, the majority of the Mohammedan Filipinos do not feel, or do not realize, that they are a part of the Filipino people. Yet, whether we wish it or not, whether they wish it or not, they and we are racially the same, have to live together in these sea-girt islands and share one common destiny."

Sofia R. de Veyra, president Federation of Women's Clubs, a woman of capacity and culture: "We will not be called upon to lead an army, as was St. Joan of Arc, nor will we have to take a gunner's place, as did Molly Pitcher, but we are called upon to stand side by side with our men to face our country's needs and do our best to remedy them. It may be true that woman's place is in the home, but the home does not have to absorb all her attention. All over the world the woman is coming into her own. We must recognize this fact. We can and we must stand by our men and face the problems with them, and we can do this without neglecting the home and without losing one particle of our own womanliness. Our work must not consist in mere idle talk. We are attending this congress in order to discuss the best means by which we may cooperate with our men in their struggle for independence. Those of us who can offer some suggestions should do so without hesitancy. We must take advantage of this opportunity, and we must have something definite, something concrete, as a result of to-day's discussion. We must realize that once independence is granted, conditions are bound to be different. There will be a time when we shall be called upon to face far greater problems than we discuss to-day. If independence is granted during our lifetime, we shall have the responsibility of setting up on its feet a new nation among nations."

In her address, Miss Paz Gloria-Canave, representing the Filipino women, said: "The women are the best teachers and the most powerful teachers. The true mother takes charge of the education of her children during the most precious and formative stage of their lives. The home is the best place to inculcate patriotism. Pictures and stories of great men could be shown and taught respectively to the children as clearly as we possibly can. Even pictures of beautiful scenes in the locality—now that this is possible through the works of some of our artists—can well adorn the home in order to make the children appreciate the beauty of their own country. * * * We are told of the immense expense, national and individual, of an independent country. The best way to prepare for this responsibility is to practice economy right away. Now and then we hear remarks that we are extravagant. In my observation I find some truth in these remarks. We women who control the purse and the budget of the family should practice economy in our daily life."

Miss Ramona Tirona, associate professor of the University of the Philippines, urged willingness to accept economic hardships, if such must be the concomitants of independent status: "Now let us briefly analyze a certain phenomenon that affects the expression of our national aspiration. I suppose that we all agree that independence is cherished by all of us. There is no mentally sound Filipino who has not thought likewise. But in spite of the general valuation of freedom there has been entertained a fear on the part of many of our people about the fate of the country in case independence is granted. What will become of our trade, of our agricultural and industrial interests, of our private and governmental institutions, of the maintenance of our government, of our safety from external attack? * * * If sacrifices are to be made for our independence, let us have them take place sooner. The torture of any expected pain that is slow in coming is greater, indeed, than that of an intensive one that is immediately experienced. * * * It behooves, therefore, the Filipino women to exercise their influence upon those fellow countrymen and women who are afraid of the future of the Philippines in the event of independence, in the cultivation and diffusion of a courageous sharing in the burdens that must be borne."

Japanese menace to a Philippine Republic was one of the subjects considered by Prof. Serafin E. Macaraig, of the University of the Philippines. He met the objection thus: "The threat of a Japanese menace and the fears that have been entertained by the Filipinos themselves against a possible Japanese invasion in the Philippines are the products of a systematic propaganda, both in Congress and in the press, which the imperialists have been pounding into us and have become a part of our thoughts and ideas. Japanese invasion, if such there be, is a political rather than a population menace. Admitting, for the sake of argument, that with the declaration of independence in the Philippines Japan would extend her imperialistic designs to the islands, it still can be maintained that the population menace can not become a reality. Conquest in the history of all colonization has brought into the conquered country not mass migration but administrators and colonizers."

Union labor had for its spokesmen at the convention Don Joaquin Balmori: "Philippine independence by virtue of economic readjustment which will come later on will give as one of its results the lessening of its public rent. Such, instead of terrifying us, should strengthen us and comfort us, and thus convinced that we should depend solely on ourselves in what pertains to our production, we should force ourselves in recovering the goal lost in the exterior market, we shall feel compelled not to rest, if we do not wish to perish absorbed by the stronger and the wealthier in the economic contest. And the element which will have the heaviest of this responsibility on its back is, without any doubt, the labor element. But the laborer, conscious of his duties, acquainted with all that he strives for, will not in any way neglect the important rôle which the Philippines has assigned him, if the working conditions be dignified and elevated, placing them, if not on the same basis, at least on one similar to those that exist in the more progressive countries of the world."

Mr. Felipe E. Jose, first vice president of the labor congress and former president of the Workers' and Peasants' Association of the Philippines, was eloquent in his interpretation of the feelings of the workers: "So with heads up and hearts open we are making it known to the four winds that the rich and powerful who desire to become leaders of national movements can be assured of our help so long as they are fighting for a common cause. Just as the common masses of yesterday proved their loyalty to their country, so are the laboring classes of to-day. The least doubt should never be entertained, for we are also prepared to die for our country's sake. We are saying plainly that if the rich and educated people think that the success of Philippine mission depends on us right now we offer our lives to fight for liberty until the last. If it is the life of the laborers that America needs to recognize our right for freedom, we are here with hearts open to offer her what is in our power."

Assurances to American investors were proclaimed in the address of the Hon. Emiliano Tria Tirona, formerly minority floor leader in the senate: "We should tell those augurers of disaster and bankruptcy that their fears are not well founded; that if we come to be independent due to the recognition of our own worth by the Congress of the United States, the Filipinos as a people and as individuals, would give to the capitalists, merchants, and American products greater protection than we now in our state of dependence receive for ourselves; and that instead of considering them as our bosses, dominators, and invaders we would look upon them as our benefactors, and their investments would be guaranteed, not only with the might of the Philippine Government but also by the might of the affection and gratitude of the whole people. The material power may be destroyed by a superior power. It is ephemeral, but the power that creates affection and gratitude is perennial. * * * It is possible and probable that the country in the first years of its independence would feel an economic depression, but such a phenomenon is registered in all countries that began to live free from foreign tutelage. Even America after its separation from England had several years of economic depression. But such an abnormal state is transitory. Sooner or later would come the normal situation."

Dean Jorge Bocobo, of the college of law, University of the Philippines, directed attention and paid tribute to the solidarity of the Filipinos as to the "great issue": "From the very nature of things, there should be only one party here, the party of the Filipino people as against the imperialist interests. The theory that for the sake of democracy we should fight our domestic issues while uniting ourselves on the independence movement has proved to be impossible. Because of the resentment caused by internal questions we find it difficult to rally the national character for united action in the independence movement. But, my countrymen, it is not too late. There is still left in the depths of our beings enough strength of will to strive together under the banner of the sun and three stars, while the radiance of our beloved flag shines on our faces that look toward the future years—the years of national dignity and national glory."

The Hon. Manuel L. Quezon, president of the Philippine Senate, was absent because of illness. A letter which he wrote to the convention I give in part: "The attitude of any American or group of Americans who has been inspired with egoistic sentiments in his relations with the Filipinos, or the behavior of any ruler who has been interpreted by us as inspired by the proposition of ignoring our rights, has never represented either the attitude or the policy in general of the people and the Government of the United States in their relations with the Filipino people. * * * To be independent is to be admitted in the family of nations; hence our acts now and our acts to-morrow as individuals and as a people should be such that would inspire the confidence and security, that we shall know how to live with other people, and that we shall know how to manage our government, not only for the benefit of the natives but also for the protection and safeguard of those residing in our own territory."

President Rafael Palma, in an address which was the valedictory of the convention, drew attention to a fact that impressed me more than any other during my visit to the Philippines. That was the tremendous interest and enthusiasm for independence among the younger generation of Filipinos: "What pleases me most on this occasion," President Palma told the several thousand delegates, "is the fact that the young generation, whom we expect to continue our labors, are so identified with our ideals and are so ready to fight more vigorously for the same principles for which we have struggled as to leave no further doubts regarding the definite destiny of the Filipino people. We who have reached the afternoon of life and can only watch as the shadows throng and lengthen with the setting of the sun on the course of life and its events, can not but feel optimistic at knowing that our efforts have not been in vain and that after us a new generation is coming so full of aspiration and vigor, a new generation to lead to its happy consummation the task that the Father has intrusted to us all."

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have an address by Hon. Ralph B. Williamson, vice chairman of the Federal Power Commission, delivered before the convention of Associated Western States Engineers at Sacramento, California, on October 28, 1931. It discusses the question of Federal and State policies with respect to water-power development. It gives especially the Federal viewpoint. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

Let me say in the beginning that the purpose of my attending this conference is not primarily to deliver this speech. I have no particular message to bring to you. While I am personally gratified by the honor of appearing upon your program, yet I want to convey to you now that my visit is merely an expression of interest of the Federal Power Commission as a whole in the problems of the West dealing with power development. I am sure that every other member of the power commission envies me this opportunity to make the personal contact with the State officers charged immediately with the control of the water resources of their respective States.

The commission believes in the closest cooperation between these public agencies, and, of course, personal contact, personal acquaintance, and first-hand knowledge of existing conditions are the first essentials in that cooperation. Commissioner Garsaud's visit of two months this summer inspecting the projects of our western licensees and familiarizing himself with western conditions was in keeping with this program.

We feel that the objectives of the Federal Power Commission and the objectives of this group of engineers, the administrative officers of our respective branches of Government, are identical in so far as our efforts are directed toward the conserving of the water resources of the country, and the causing of them to be put to work in the interests of the people who are or will be the inhabitants of the respective sections.

The subject assigned to me is the Federal Viewpoint and Policies with Respect to the Control of Water and the Development of Power. The arrangement of the program indicates, however, that it is desired that the subject be discussed in its relation to the State's interest in that resource, and such discussion is timely.

The possibility of conflict between the States and the Federal Government is necessarily inherent in the very form of the Government prescribed in our Constitution. The more or less elaborate machinery provided for the dual system in our Constitution is probably the reason why Anatole France referred to it as the greatest invention of governmental machinery in the history of the world. It is what makes this Republic different from others which have gone before, and in so far as it serves the purpose of protecting the interests of the people it must, of course, be preserved.

The question of the extent of the power of the units making up this dual form of government is purely a political or governmental question. While it has been the subject of some of the most fundamental controversies in history, the merits of the arguments for State rights or for greater centralization of power in the Federal Government is not the subject for discussion here. We, as administrative officers, are not so much concerned with the theory of this question as we are with the practical and effective administration of laws which may in themselves furnish the basis for legalistic conflict.

I was much impressed with the way in which Mr. Harding handled the subject this morning, referring in his discussion to the overlapping of jurisdiction or authority and defining the situation as one in which conflict does not necessarily exist but might easily arise.

In the argument which wages over the question of States' rights and Federal centralization the statesmen of each group base their position upon the belief that the interests of the people can best be served through the agency respectively advocated. Therefore, the problem before the administrative officers of the States and the Federal Government is to so administer overlapping laws or overlapping jurisdiction as to avoid any conflict which would defeat this purpose.

In a very few branches of governmental activity is the legal or economic line of demarcation between the State and Federal control less clearly drawn than that dealing with the subject of the use of water for hydroelectric development. For that reason, in this field is the greatest opportunity for the cooperative development of a satisfactory legislative and administrative machinery for the protection of the rights of the whole people, not alone in preserving for them the natural resources still under the control of the States or of the Federal Government but in encouraging development of such resources in their common interest.

The Federal Government approaches the matter of control of water for hydroelectric purposes from two avenues: First, by reason of the ownership of lands containing power possibilities; and, second, by such control as it may have over the navigable waters of the United States by virtue of the commerce clause of the Constitution.

Naturally, most of the applications for power development coming before the Federal Power Commission from the Western States are based upon the Government's ownership of the land, whereas, a large percentage of the applications coming from the Eastern States involve navigable waters, and it is the Federal policy with respect to power development in the first division which is of most interest to those assembled here.

In discussing a Federal policy with regard to such matters, it must be recognized that there may be a distinction between the policy as reflected in the legislation covering the matter and the policy of the administrative body authorized to carry out the purposes of such legislation. The former policy is a more or less fixed one, whereas, the latter policy may change with a change in personnel. While, theoretically, this should not be true, as a practical matter we know that the personal views of the individuals composing the administrative body often produce wide variance in legal interpretation of legislative policies.

For the purposes of this discussion, however, we may say that there are certain fundamental principles relative to the subject rather definitely expressed in the Federal water power act itself, and it is this policy, thus clearly disclosed, that can properly be said to represent the Federal viewpoint. The legislative body is the proper and only authoritative agency to define the policy of any of its legislation as regards the State and Federal fields of action.

The reading of the Federal water power act suggests to me that Congress in this legislation, perhaps more than in any piece of legislation upon its records upon similar subjects, has sought to protect and preserve to the States not only the rights, privileges, and benefits of the State in the resource itself, but its power through local governmental action to regulate and control the resources thus developed to the advantage of its citizens.

Let us examine the act for specific support of these assertions.

First, in section 9 (b) of the act, satisfactory evidence of compliance by the applicant with all of the requirements of the laws of the State or States within which the proposed project is to be located, with respect to beds and banks, appropriation, diversion, and use of water for power purposes, as well as with respect to the right of the applicant to engage in the business within that State is made a condition precedent to the granting of any license by the commission.

In most instances, of course, a licensed power project in any of the Western States requires coordinate use of the State's water and the Federal Governments land, and Congress has apparently recognized the necessity of cooperation between the States and the Federal Government in development of plans for the utilization of such combined resources in the production of hydroelectric energy. While it has been suggested that this may produce, under certain circumstances, or possibly already has produced, a situation where a deadlock exists so far as the development of hydroelectric power is concerned, at least, it can be said that in this particular respect the Federal water power act has recognized and protected the interests of the State in this particular field.

With regard to the second phase of the State's authority in this matter, i. e., the regulatory phase, section 19 of the Federal water power act, is interesting. In this section the act confers upon any State which has provided a commission or other authority, the exclusive jurisdiction to regulate rates, services, and securities of any Federal licensee developing such hydroelectric power project and distributing its product for sale within the State. True, section 20 vests in the United States the power of regulation of rates, services, and securities of the licensee's product, which either through the licensee, a subsidiary corporation, or a customer, finds its way into interstate commerce, but this is not a limitation upon the State's jurisdiction, but a power, which, in any event, is outside of the scope of State jurisdiction. It is a phase of regulation exclusively within the jurisdiction of the United States, the exercise of which in the common interest is undoubtedly advisable.

Viewing the act from the more immediate material interest of the State, it is apparent that Congress pursued the same policy of recognition in other sections of the act. For example, section 10 (e) reserves to the Government the right of expropriation to the Government of any excessive profits of operation only until such time as the States shall make provision for the preventing of excessive profits or the expropriation thereof to themselves.

Again, in section 14, the State is given the power to acquire, through condemnation, upon payment of just compensation, any power project licensed within that State by the Federal Power Commission.

By section 13, of all the proceeds received by the United States from charges levied by the Federal Power Commission under the authority of this section, including the rentals of public lands involved, 37½ per cent is distributed to the State within which such power development is located. It is interesting to note that up to and including June 30, 1931, there has been paid to the States under this section the sum of $274,100.51. This sum has been annually increasing, from about $6,000 in 1922 to $70,567.21 for the year ending June 30, 1931. Not only that, but by the same section it is provided that 50 per cent of the charges made for the use and occupancy of public lands and reservations, other than Indian reservations, is to be paid into the reclamation fund for further development of the agricultural lands within the States where such projects are situated, and inasmuch as to date the activities of the reclamation division have been within the States represented here a continuation of this policy can only be beneficial to general development of your respective States.

While the foregoing are the principal recognitions of the States' rights as set out in the Federal water power act, there are many other provisions which take into consideration the rights of the States and preserve to the States the exercise of those rights. For instance, section 4 (d) of the act requires full publicity of the proposed project before the resource is tied up by license. Section 7 gives a preference right of license to States and municipalities whose plans provide for the development of the public interest of water resources of the region, and where such State or municipality avails itself of this preference, and shows itself able and willing to carry out the development to the best public interest in such resource, it is provided by section 10 (e) that no charge against such State or municipality for the use of such public resources of the United States shall be made unless power is sold at a profit.

There is another provision of the act which is of immense importance to the Western States. It is paragraph (a) of section 10, which requires the Federal Power Commission to consider only such projects as worthy of receiving a license as can be best adapted to a comprehensive scheme of improvement and utilization of the stream, not only for the purposes of navigation and power development, but for other beneficial public uses.

In the West we know that of the basic industries, agriculture is the most important in point of future development if not at present in point of profit. Agriculture here means irrigation, and in many States irrigation and power development are antagonistic. While the present Power Commission has not had occasion to announce a policy in this respect, I know I am safe in assuring you that it will recognize the principle that in these Western States every opportunity should be embraced to permit the fullest irrigation expansion. It will recognize that in many cases a joint development if irrigation and power makes for the largest use for both purposes, and I am sure such a policy will be fully encouraged on any stream when such situation presents itself.

While it is not of such immediate interest to this body, the States and the people within the States will receive great benefits from the activities of the Federal Power Commission in carrying out the authority specified in section 4 of the act. Briefly, it is to carry on investigations, collect and record data concerning the water-power industry and its relation to other industries, the fixing of valuation and net investment of projects constructed under Federal license, the establishment of accounting systems which may lead, of course, to uniform practices, and in all of this work the Federal Power Commission is specifically authorized in the act to cooperate with executive departments and other agencies of the various States.

The present commission is now conducting a rather extensive study under this section, and feels that a real contribution can be made to the present general knowledge of the subject in many of its phases now but guessed at. This feature of our work will be of great importance to the States in their regulatory activities.

While it is apparent, as before stated, and as appears from this recital of a few of the provisions of the act, that Congress was generous in its recognition of States' interest and welfare, both material and as far as the principles of self-government were concerned, yet at the same time, the Federal Government has laid down in the act very clearly a policy of protecting also the Federal interest in those resources, as well as establishing a definite policy for the protection and development of navigation in those streams where interstate commerce is, or may be, a matter of public benefit.

In the use of the terms "State's interest" and "Federal interest" and in the use of the word "conflict" in referring to these interests, we have been using terms common to former discussions of the subject, and assume that in this field the same old historic antagonism exists between these two agencies.

As a matter of fact, when we speak of the Federal interest we can only properly refer to the interest of the people of the United States as a whole as distinguished from the different groups of that whole segregated within the geographical boundaries known as State lines.

While there are many forceful reasons why the principle of State rights, as far as they pertain to the governmental machinery, must be preserved, much less can be said for the application of this doctrine when it is advanced for the purpose of preserving to one group of people some particular material advantage which it may have by reason of the chance location of public resources within certain arbitrary boundaries originally fixed for purely governmental reasons.

The doctrine of State rights as a political doctrine was intended by the framers of our Constitution to assist in bringing about a proper machinery of government for the benefit of the whole people. The dual form of government as a vehicle for allocating wealth was not in the minds of our first statesmen, I am sure. I am inclined to think, therefore, that when we discuss the question of development and control of the hydroelectric industry we are liable to take the political doctrines of the division of rights between the State and Federal Government into a field where it was never intended to carry much weight, and where its stressing may seriously interfere with the best interests of the people, both of the States and of the United States as a whole.

Considering the question from this angle, perhaps a different light can be cast upon the one clause of the Federal water power act, which has caused the greatest opposition from the States. This is the recapture clause, set forth in sections 14 and 15, enabling the United States to recover possession of power sites and of the project works on the basis of actual legitimate investment in such project.

The advantage to the State as a result of this procedure might, however, prove to more than offset any feared adverse results at the end of the license period of 50 years, if such recapture clause should then be enforced. The basis of such recapture, if at all, would be the net investment in the project, the method of determining which is fully outlined in the act, and based upon the actual legitimate cost of the project plus betterments and additions and less depreciation and other reserves.

While there is nothing in the act to force a policy of public ownership upon the Federal Government, or upon the States or municipalities, there is, nevertheless, under this clause preserved to them an opportunity which may grow more valuable as time goes on, to acquire such projects upon a more advantageous basis than in the absence of such provision from the act.

So much for the policy as disclosed in the Federal water power act.

I think I am safe in assuring you that the present Federal Power Commission, collectively and individually, will be free from the criticism made of many Federal bodies, that it will desire to expand and assume more and more jurisdiction at the expense of State jurisdiction. Such accusation presupposes a sort of thirst for personal authority at the expense of some other organization, the evidence of which is not apparent in this commission as at present constituted.

On the other hand, it is the desire of this commission to fully enforce and administer the terms of the Federal water power act, and by the fairness of such administration gain the confidence of the States, the people and the water-power industry itself, which will enable it to effectively assist in the protection of the public interest, especially in that field where no control or supervision has been heretofore legally possible, as well as to cooperate with the States in developing some principles of procedure which may result in a different mechanism than has as yet been employed to accomplish this purpose.

From the beginning most of the arguments advanced for State rights as against Federal centralization, and vice versa, have contemplated either exclusive State jurisdiction or exclusive Federal jurisdiction. In a general way, the advocates are either highly aggressive or firmly defensive. The intermediate field of cooperative endeavor is very little explored, either from a legislative or an administrative standpoint. Congressional encouragement of activities along this line is probably more clearly expressed in the Federal water power act than in any former national legislation.

Probably in the field which we are discussing—controlled water-power development, and the incidental field of regulated distribution of hydroelectric energy—an opportunity offers for developing and carrying out some plan of Federal and State cooperation different from that heretofore devised.

It is true that much thought has been given to the creation of some machinery which will accomplish the successful carrying out of such purpose. Interstate compacts have been suggested, Federal control with regional centralization, joint boards as Federal agencies, Federal and State cooperation with State commissions as Federal agencies, all of which suggestions are directly made in the spirit of reaching some better machinery of cooperation between the regulatory bodies. Underlying all of such suggestions is the prejudice, conscious or unconscious, in favor of the protection of the original political rights vested in such agencies.

The proponents of such measures have apparently failed to see a reason for distinguishing between the importance of the doctrine of State rights in government and its application to the problem of control and regulation of large economic developments.

The political aspects are still an obstruction to the clear view of a solution of this problem, which is an economic one.

The traditions of water power, which a half century or more ago were more or less confined to the "picturesque mill" or to the water-driven enterprise, used mainly for grinding grist or sawing lumber, still are felt when we approach the solution of the problem of control and development of electricity on a large scale and perfecting the methods of transferring this "liquid dynamic force" hundreds of miles for use in our domestic and industrial life. To-day this industry is neither exclusively local nor exclusively national, but if complete supervision is to be had it must be had through cooperation of both local and national control.

In conclusion, let me say that in my opinion the question must be approached with the closest cooperation between the State commissions and the Federal agencies, acting entirely free from the prejudices which have grown up around the subject of States' rights as a political issue, and especially in the mutual confidence that there is to be no undue overreaching or selfish attempt for either to take unto itself power for the pure sake of power. This cooperation must recognize as its basic principle the real economic nature of the business with which it is dealing, that it is local in certain phases of its operation and national in other phases, and that the whole must be brought under some form of complete public governmental control and regulation which will bring about not only better service at lower rates, but establish the industry itself in such financial position that investment therein is safe and not speculative. There is here, I believe, a field which must engage our interest and which promises ample reward for all concerned.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I notice in to-day's RECORD a number of letters relating to Philippine independence. I notice the implication that the Filipinos are of one mind regarding this matter. I have received during the summer adjournment a number of letters that take a different position from that reported by the commissioners whose letters appear in the RECORD, and in order to present the other side of the question I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the Los Angeles Times of December 2 by a Filipino lawyer, Mr. Vicente Villamin.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the Los Angeles Times, December 2, 1931]

ECONOMY OF PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

By Vicente Villamin

(The author is a Filipino lawyer and economist, holding no official position, whose presentation of the Philippine question has received wide-favorable editorial comment in the American press.)

The Philippine-independence question, thanks to the American farmer, is now on the sounding boards of the country as an economic proposition. Its discussion has shifted from the theoretical to the practical, from the sentimental to the realistic.

Since the passage of the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act over a year ago certain farm groups in America, insisting that the free entry of Philippine sugar and cocoanut oil is detrimental to their interests, have been urging the concession of immediate unconditional independence to the Philippines to place Philippine products on a taxable basis and keep them out of the United States.

This proposal produced a revision of political views in the Philippines. Instead of enlisting the cooperation of the Filipino nationalists, who have been demanding independence, it made them cautious and conservative.

Thus Senator Quezon, the head and front of the Filipino separatist movement, announced to the Philippine Legislature a fortnight ago the adoption of the formula of deferred or postponed as distinguished from immediate, automatic independence. General Aguinaldo, the revolutionary leader of yesteryear, calls the former a traitor for modifying his immediatist position on independence. There must be personal animus on the part of General Aguinaldo rather than political dissent, for he himself had announced his belief in the new formula long before Senator Quezon embraced it publicly.

The change in the Filipino nationalist front is the result of economic considerations. Independence will automatically remove the Philippines from inside the tariff wall of the United States, robbing Philippine industries of the American tariff protection. Deprived of that protection, those industries will collapse, bringing down the country's economic structure, shaking the foundation of society and government, and plunging the people into a state of acute poverty and distress, chaos and unrest.

The present Philippine economico-political set-up is the result of the operation and inspiration of the Jones law, an act of Congress in 1916, constituting the organic law of the Philippines. The purpose of that law is to grant eventual absolute independence. In consonance with that purpose the Filipinos were given local self-government so nearly complete that it was feared that America had been placed in the unenviable position of responsibility without commensurate authority in the premises.

At the same time the Philippines were included more completely within the tariff wall of the United States through the elimination of all trade restrictions between the mainland and the islands. This naturally gave the implication of permanency of Philippine-American relations and encouraged the development of the tariff-protected industries to the neglect of the unprotected ones.

Restated succinctly, the Jones law released two forces running against each other—the political force acting centrifugally away from American control and the economic force operating centripetally toward an economic union with America. Thus to-day, while the Philippines are almost independent of American control politically, they are dependent on the American tariff system economically. This is ideal for the Philippines if they are to remain with America permanently, which is not in the cards.

New avenues of approach to the goal of ultimate independence, all lighted with the lamp of economics, have been pointed out. There is a suggestion to grant the Philippines early political independence, but continuing the Philippine-American free trade for a specified period of years. Unfortunately this is not feasible under the most-favored-nation clause of the treaties of the United States with some 50 nations, prohibiting the giving of preferential tariff concessions.

The way to render this clause inoperative is to permit America, by treaty, to occupy, if she will, a special political position in the Philippine republic in partial derogation of Philippine sovereignty after the example of Cuba under the Platt amendment. This move would make Philippine independence a grand and solemn fiction after all the efforts to get it.

Another plan is provided in the Hawes-Cutting bill. The Filipino political leaders themselves call this plan unwise. It purports to prepare the Philippines for the heavy burdens of nationhood by weakening their economic sinews through a 5-year process of disintegrating the economic structure that has taken many patient years to build. It calls for the imposition of increasing tariff rates on Philippine imports to America until the full duty under the law is reached in five years, at which time the Filipinos, after realizing what it means to lose the American markets, are to express themselves in a plebiscite whether they want to be independent or not.

The principal proposal of Senator Quezon is the maintenance of the political status quo with greater local self-government and a plebiscite in 10 years to register the considered judgment of the Filipino people on independence. In the first place, this is a direct negation of all proindependence protestations, admitting, as it does, the possibility that the Filipinos might not want to be an independent nation after all. This principle is loaded with dynamite. In the second place, such plebiscitary determination can have only persuasive and not binding effect on Congress, and as such can serve no higher purpose than give rise in the future to bitter controversies and disillusionments.

It is politically smart in the islands to stand on a metaphorical wailing wall and bemoan the supposed uncertainty in the future political status of the country. Thus the most popular suggestion is that Congress, by an act, name a definite date in the future when independence shall be granted. Unhappily this proposal is not practicable under American constitutional law, which holds that no Congress can bind succeeding Congresses in matters involving, as does the Philippine question, the exercise of legislative discretion and national and international policies.

The solution of the Philippine-independence question is the Jones law itself plus Filipino work, patience, consistency, and planning. This law is comprehensive and flexible enough so that under it the Filipinos themselves can work out an economic and other programs of preparation for eventual independence, doing away with mere oratorical and rhetorical preparations. To make their efforts more effective the law should be amended to empower the Philippines to negotiate, subject to the approval of the United States, treaties with foreign nations to afford the Filipinos full opportunity of exploring the possibilities of new markets. This would be a tremendous acquisition of autonomous power by the Filipinos.

The economic plan upon which the Philippines should embark under the Jones law must rest on two major propositions. First, the stoppage of the acreage expansion of the tariff-protected products, like sugar and coconut oil, a policy that is easy of execution because the Government controls over 70 per cent of the lands and the greater part of the area of the country is idle. Second, the development, instead, of unprotected products, such as rubber, camphor, quinine, spices, and other tropical raw materials. This is the natural development of the Philippines. It is both sound economics and good politics.

This plan will solve a row of problems. It will meet the complaint of the American farmer against the potential expansion of those Philippine products which he considers competitive, place in the meantime Philippine-American commercial relations on a more complementary basis, build up the islands through intensive development and diversification, give time to the present tariff-protected industries for the inevitable readjustments and, above all, create in the islands a new, self-sustaining economic structure that can stand by itself without being supported by the American tariff system.

Thus the Filipinos would be placed in a condition eventually to separate from America as an independent nation not only painlessly but with the essential economic equipment for nationhood. The logic of the plan is to achieve economic independence from America gradually and not bluntly. With economic independence political independence should follow as a matter of course. The other way around, considering the prevailing economico-political set-up, would be like moving from effect to cause, a procedure that invariably ends in failure.

The Philippine Legislature is fully empowered to adopt the means to carry out the plan. For instance, a simple act placing fair and prudential tonnage restrictions on the export of tariff-protected commodities to America, while holding out concrete inducements for the development of the dormant products which are on the free list, will be effective in deflecting the course of exports, expanding the market for Philippine products, and rendering the Philippines less and less dependent on the American tariff system until their complete independence therefrom is attained and Philippine products are placed on a world-wide market basis.

It is time that the Filipinos should think how they can develop their natural resources themselves. The Filipinos to-day hold the megaphone, but not the purse strings, and as such their power is chimerical. As Americans in the past employed European capital to develop their country, so the Filipinos to-day should go out of their borders for financial and technical assistance to build up their country. Who alone but themselves can deter them from so beneficial and so patriotic an undertaking?

When, at last, the condition of preparedness becomes an accomplished fact and the Congress moves to grant independence, the enabling congressional act should be accompanied, under a specific provision to that effect, with the overt act by the President of actually granting independence during the legal life of the Congress that shall have passed the independence legislation. That will bring to the family of nations the newly born Philippine republic.

CONSERVATION OF WILD LIFE

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 263) to insure adequate supplies of wild life, plant and animal, including forests, fish and game, for the people of the United States; to secure the correlation and most economical conduct of wild-life research and restocking and the elimination of duplication of effort and expense between the several departments of the Federal Government having to do with the same; to promote the development and extension of experimental stations for breeding; to promote studies of diseases and other factors limiting the natural supply; and for other purposes.

PROPOSED HOLIDAY RECESS

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senate to consider briefly the question of the proposed Christmas holiday recess. The suggestion has been made that we recess from next Saturday until January 4. I want to suggest for the consideration of the Senate that on next Tuesday night we take a recess until the following Monday. That would give us a recess of five days.

We are proposing to take a recess, Mr. President, under circumstances and conditions which do not usually attend preparations for a holiday recess. If conditions were such as they usually are when we are contemplating a holiday recess, I should not offer a word of objection to any agreement which those who have charge of the matter might make in regard to the duration of the recess. But the Congress has been absent from Washington now for nine months. During that time many questions of very great moment have arisen with which Congress alone can deal.

The President, for some reason satisfactory to himself, has refused during those nine months the cooperation of the legislative branch of the Government. The result is that measures have accumulated, problems are pressing for solution, and Congress is now in session facing the most tremendous task that, with possibly two exceptions, ever confronted a Congress in the history of the United States.

But while the President has refused to call us in session, fortunately the Constitution of the United States has called us together. I have had occasion many times since I have been in public life to be thankful for the wisdom and the foresight of the men who framed the Constitution of the United States, and I am again thankful, in view of the fact that they provided a day definite for the meeting of Congress, a day which the President or no one else can postpone, and also provided that the Congress of the United States can not be adjourned until Congress determines for itself the day of adjournment. We are here now, here under the command of the Constitution, and the responsibility which rests upon us, as I have said, is a very grave one.

Mr. President, in view of the situation which confronts us and of the work that is before us, which we can not possibly complete by the meeting time of the national conventions—and that will mean, in all probability, the adjourning time for Congress—I suggest in all seriousness to my colleagues that they consider the advisability of taking merely a 5-day recess. It seems to me that we will gain much by doing so.

Mr. President, I repeat that, in view of the situation, I do not think it is a proper thing for Congress to take a two weeks' recess, and I trust therefore that those who have the matter in charge will consider the suggestion I have made.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I feel very much in sympathy with the views expressed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I do not know how others may feel about it—I have not conferred with Senators on the subject at all—but speaking for myself, I do feel that we owe it to the country to stay here and render what service we can in order to be helpful in this time of real distress.

We may not be able to accomplish a great deal. I know the committees are busy. They have referred bills to the various departments and are awaiting the reports of departments, but we will be able to make some progress should we remain here. In that event, we may take a recess for two days at a time, or what not, if the occasion justifies; but we ought not to quit our work for two weeks when it is possible that we will be needed here, and during that time could attend to the public business, which we were elected to transact.

I myself feel that the suggestion of a 5-day recess is wise, and that such a recess will afford ample time for the holiday. We are, in fact, not now in position to take any holiday. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to go right on without any recess at all; but five days will enable the committees to report on bills, and we will probably lose no time, as far as legislation is concerned, if we take that much recess. However, I do not feel, under the circumstances, that we would be doing our full duty to the public if we took a holiday recess of two weeks.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator whether or not during the recess the committees will be in session? I know that a number of committees of which I am a member intend to have some meetings during the holidays. I had supposed that a good many of the committees would be holding meetings during the proposed recess and that many Senators at least would be examining the numerous bills which have been offered and would be obtaining information preparatory to engaging in intensive work when the recess shall be over and the Senate shall again convene. I have no objection to the suggestion made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] but I am merely making the inquiry of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. FLETCHER. I think some of the committees undoubtedly will be in session during the recess. There is, however, no way of compelling them to do so; it will be in the hands of each committee to determine about holding sessions and whether or not they can get a quorum. But let the responsibility fall on those who want to go home and not on the whole Senate. I think the committees ought to be in session and attend to their work during the recess.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, we have been here now since the 7th day of December and we have yet to pass a single bill. We have not done anything to relieve the terrible distress of the people all over the country. Financial institutions everywhere are waiting anxiously to know what the Senate and the Congress of the United States are going to do, and I would favor sitting here until we accomplish something for the people of the United States.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, may we consider now the amendment to Senate bill 263?

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, before we leave the question of a holiday recess, I want to say a word or two on my own account. Before the last session adjourned the Congress was discredited in the public press by the administration and everybody else. They said that if they could get rid of Congress, prosperity was just around the corner. I demanded an extra session on the floor of the Senate before the adjournment of the last session, because the big questions now pressing were also in view then. However, it was said that if we could get rid of Congress then everything would be all right. They got rid of it, and then one plan after another was started to reach the prosperity. The first one that came along was the proposal for the consolidation of the big eastern railroads. That was to bring back prosperity by starting another gigantic stock boom. Well, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] had something to say about that, and that scheme blew up.

Then along came the 15 per cent rate advance for the railroads. That was to be another basis of starting a stock boom and bringing prosperity back in this country. Even Members of Congress demanded that this advance be allowed without a hearing, and, if the commission refused to grant it, that the commission itself be abolished. They even went as far as that. The commission did not do it, however, and that boom blew up.

Then along came the moratorium; and that did start a stock boom for a few days, but in a few days that blew up, and prosperity was not here yet.

Then the last gigantic effort was made to organize a great Wall Street corporation of some kind to finance the frozen assets of the banks of the country, and that went awry. Through all of this, instead of reaching prosperity by the absence of Congress we have gone deeper and deeper into this depression.

Mr. President, I have put a picture of that stock situation on the wall over here. It covers about 60 years of American history, beginning with 1872. If you follow that chart you will find that up to 1904 there was a gradual rise, and then from 1904 to 1914 there was a considerable advance in stock prices, creating a new level some 33 per cent higher than the previous level. Then after 1914 the wise men of Wall Street got control of the economic situation in this country, the credit and everything else; and just look on that chart and see what happened! There never was such an economic monstrosity in the history of the world as appears since the 1914 level.

Then in 1929 that bubble burst. All the credit of the United States, all the earnings of the people of the United States, were not able to sustain those gigantic stock waterings and frauds and deceptions and false pretenses that were put out to deceive the people of this country. Big banks of New York, which were loaded up with the worthless securities of foreign countries and with the still more worthless securities behind these watered stocks, had been working at their scheme of unloading those securities upon the little banks of the country. As a result, seven or eight thousand of the little banks of the country have gone down; and the big banks themselves, still loaded up with that sort of thing, still looking for a chance to save themselves, come in at this session with a two-billion-dollar proposition to take money out of the Treasury of the United States to save themselves from the wreck and ruin that they have put upon all the rest of the country.

Those stock prices have dropped back according to that chart, but they are still 50 per cent higher than the 1914 stock levels; and they are still enormously inflated, because the 1914 level itself was too high. So this stock inflation hangs there yet as a menace over this country.

The general level of commodity prices has dropped. In the index on yesterday it was slightly below the 1914 level; but these stock prices which they are attempting to maintain, and even to start another boom to boost them higher, are still 50 per cent up in the air above that high level.

Mr. President, the principal cause of this situation was the striking down of agriculture in 1920. Agriculture, representing one-third of the American people, was deflated by special action of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks, by special control of the credit of the United States, and was stricken down into depression deeply in the latter part of 1920 and the beginning of 1921. Agriculture has stayed down ever since. We had the revival of other business in 1922. Even the great inflation and speculation of 1929 followed, but agriculture stayed down through it all. The buying power of agriculture was enormously reduced, and at the present time its credit is entirely destroyed. That situation has affected every other legitimate business in the country, and legitimate business has now gone down, too—not yet so low as agriculture, but very much below these watered-stock values as they still continue to exist, as shown by this chart; and perhaps 7,000,000 men are unemployed.

Mr. President, I wanted Congress to stay in session last spring. I wanted an extra session in September. I wired the President, when he wired me about the moratorium, admitting that it was an important thing and demanding that he then call an extra session, so that we might have a legal vote of the Congress upon it instead of the straw vote which he was taking. All of this was unheeded.

Now, we come into this session. What is it that the Wall Street crowd want now? They seem to be entirely in control of the situation. What movement is being made by the leadership of either side to relieve agriculture of this condition or relieve unemployment that have caused the greatest depths of this depression? I do not hear a word about the relief of men. It is about the banks, and about the railroads, and the financial institutions, that we hear the words spoken on this floor and in the committees.

I should like well enough to continue in session Christmas Day and every day, if we could do anything about this depression. I have just listened to a part of the brilliant speech of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. I agree that the facts he stated are substantially true; but I listened in vain for any plan coming from him or from the Democratic side or anywhere else for the relief of this situation.

What are we going to do if we stay here? About the same thing that we shall do if we go away. Already the Republican National Committee has met and held its mournful session. By the middle of January the Democratic committee will meet and attempt to hold a session to avoid blunders enough to stave off defeat. The whole situation is political. No questions are being considered here upon their merits. The whole thing is, What can we do to avoid defeat in the one case or to win a victory in the other case in the political contest that is in view?

Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, if I could see a plan coming from either side of this Chamber for the definite relief of this situation, I would be for it, and I would be willing to stay in session all the time; but, as I size it up, it seems to me it is going to make little difference. The same forces that refused to call an extra session of Congress to give us ample time to consider these questions upon their merits, as the Congress of the United States ought to consider them, are now without a plan to do anything in this Congress, and they are on both sides of the aisle and in control.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Senator is correct in his conclusion, the thing for Congress to do is not to take a recess, but to take a final adjournment.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think that is correct, as far as accomplishing anything in this session is concerned.

LOSSES IN PRICE OF STOCKS

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, in connection with what the Senator from Iowa is saying about the fear that is expressed by so many newspapers and economists of having Congress in session on the ground that it would hurt business, let me say that I received in the mail a few days ago a compilation of the prices of the stocks of the leading corporations of the United States, listing the prices under date of March 4, when Congress adjourned, and listing them again on November 28, a week before Congress met. During that period the administration had full opportunity to bring business back on its feet without any interference by Congress.

I shall not take the time to read the striking declines of prices, although I do want to call attention to the stocks of just a few of the most outstanding organizations of the country.

For instance, the stock of the Illinois Central Railroad on March 4 was 78. On November 28 it was 13.

The stock of the New York Central Railroad was 116¼ on March 4, and it was 28⅛ on November 28.

The stock of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad was 76⅛ when Congress adjourned. It was 23⅛ on November 28.

The stock of the Electric Bond & Share Co.—the greatest electrical company in the world—was 53½ when Congress adjourned. It was 15⅜ on November 28.

The stock of the Chase National Bank was 102 when Congress adjourned. It was 39¾ on November 28.

The stock of the Guaranty Trust Co. of New York was 539 when Congress adjourned. It was 296 on the 28th of November.

There are other stocks listed here, together with the percentages of loss; and I ask to have them inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CONSERVATION OF WILD LIFE

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 263) to insure adequate supplies of wild life, plant and animal, including forests, fish, and game for the people of the United States; to secure the correlation and most economical conduct of wild-life research and restocking and the elimination of duplication of effort and expense between the several departments of the Federal Government having to do with the same; to promote the development and extension of experimental stations for breeding; to promote studies of diseases and other factors limiting the natural supply; and for other purposes.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] speak as to his amendment at this time?

I desire to say, Mr. President, that the suggestion of the amendment has been adopted and the committee has reprinted the bill (S. 263) as the result of a meeting held yesterday afternoon at which all of the objectors to certain portions of this bill were present. They made certain suggestions which improved the bill materially; and I believe there is only one amendment that has been reported that interferes with the consideration of the amended bill as reprinted, a copy of which is on every Senator's desk this morning.

Therefore may I ask the Senator from Wisconsin to make a statement with reference to his amendment, as the amendment has been entirely dealt with in the new print of the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would like to state first that under the rules if a substitute measure is offered the pending bill must be amended before action is taken upon the substitute bill. The Senator, of course, may withdraw his amendment if he desires.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President I think the ruling is accurate. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] has an amendment which has been met in the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Connecticut.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The original amendment can be withdrawn then.

Mr. McNARY. By unanimous consent, of course, we could operate and have the substitution made at this time; and, in my opinion, if that were done it would hasten the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I was about to state that the amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Connecticut is in the nature of a substitute amendment. I understand that it is the result of the action of the committee, and that the amendment about to be proposed by the Senator in effect strikes out section 8 and accomplishes identically the same object that my amendment to the original bill would accomplish if it were adopted. I therefore ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment I offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that may be done.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I ask now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the committee amendment to Senate bill 263.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut offers a substitute bill, which will be reported to the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Connecticut proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Commerce are authorized to provide expert assistance to and to cooperate with Federal, State, and other agencies in the rearing, stocking, and increasing the supply of game and fur-bearing animals and fish, in combating diseases, and in developing a nation-wide program of wild-life conservation and rehabilitation.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Commerce are authorized to make such investigations as they may deem necessary to determine the effects of domestic sewage, trade wastes, and other polluting substances on wild life, with special reference to birds, mammals, fish, and shellfish, and to make reports to the Congress of their investigations with recommendations for remedial measures. Such investigations shall include studies of methods for the recovery of wastes and the collation of data on the progress being made in these fields for the use of Federal, State, municipal, and private agencies.

SEC. 3. (a) Whenever the Federal Government, through the Bureau of Reclamation or otherwise, impounds water for any use, opportunity shall be given to the Bureau of Fisheries and/or the Bureau of Biological Survey to make such uses of the impounded waters for fish-culture stations and migratory-bird resting and nesting areas as are not inconsistent with the primary use of the waters and/or the constitutional rights of the States. In the case of any waters heretofore impounded by the United States through the Bureau of Reclamation or otherwise, the Bureau of Fisheries and/or the Bureau of Biological Survey may consult with the Bureau of Reclamation or other governmental agency controlling the impounded waters, with a view to securing a greater biological use of the waters not inconsistent with their primary use and/or the constitutional rights of the States and make such proper uses thereof as are not inconsistent with the primary use of the waters and/or the constitutional rights of the States.

(b) Hereafter whenever any dam is authorized to be constructed, either by the Federal Government itself or by any private agency under Government permit, the Bureau of Fisheries shall be consulted, and before such construction is begun or permit granted, when deemed necessary, due and adequate provision, if economically practicable, shall be made for the migration of fish life from the upper to the lower and from the lower to the upper waters of said dam by means of fish lifts, ladders, or other devices.

SEC. 4. The Office of Indian Affairs, the Bureau of Fisheries, and the Bureau of Biological Survey are authorized, jointly, to prepare plans for the better protection of the wild-life resources, including fish, migratory waterfowl and upland game birds, game animals and fur-bearing animals, upon all the Indian reservations and unallotted Indian lands coming under the supervision of the Federal Government. When such plans have been prepared they shall be promulgated by the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Agriculture, who are authorized to make the necessary regulations for enforcement thereof and from time to time to change, alter, or amend such regulations.

SEC. 5. The Bureau of Biological Survey and the Bureau of Fisheries are hereby authorized to make surveys of the wild-life resources of the public domain, or of any lands owned or leased by the Government, to conduct such investigations as may be necessary for the development of a program for the maintenance of an adequate supply of wild life in these areas, to establish thereon game farms and fish-cultural stations commensurate with the need for replenishing the supply of game and fur-bearing animals and fish, and, in cooperation with the National Park Service, the Forest Service, or other Federal agencies, the State agencies, to coordinate and establish adequate measures for wild-life control on such game farms and fish-cultural stations: Provided, however, That no such game farm hereafter established shall exceed 2,000 acres in size: And provided further, That not more than one such game farm shall hereafter be established in any State without the consent of the legislature of that State.

SEC. 6. In carrying out the provisions of this act the Federal agencies charged with its enforcement may cooperate with other Federal agencies and with States, counties, municipalities, individuals, and public and private agencies, organizations, and institutions, and may accept donations of lands, funds, and other aids to the development of the program authorized in this act: Provided, however, That no such donations of land shall be accepted without consent of the legislature of the State in which such land may be situated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the first amendment should be proposed to the original bill. If there are no amendments to that, then the question is on amending the proposed substitute.

Mr. KING. I am addressing myself to the substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is now open to amendment.

Mr. KING. I offer an amendment, on line 22, page 4, after the word "farm," to insert the words "except one in the State of Wyoming"; and also, on line 21, to strike out the words "not more than one" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "no," so that it will read as amended, "That no such game farm, except one in the State of Wyoming, shall hereafter be established in any State without the consent of the legislature of the State."

May I say to the Senator from Connecticut that under the proposed substitute one farm could be established in a State without the consent of the legislature of the State. My amendment would inhibit the establishment of any of these preserves, except one in the State of Wyoming, without the consent of the legislature. If it is appropriate to prohibit the establishment of two of these preserves without the consent of the legislature, then it seems to me it is proper to prohibit the establishment of one preserve without the consent of the legislature.

I may say that while there is an apparent discrimination in the amendment because it excepts one in the State of Wyoming, I understand that there has been a large preserve of importance and benefit already established but not recognized by the Federal Government, and which it is agreed should come in under the operation of this bill. There is no necessity for the legislature to agree to that, because it is almost a fait accompli. So I have excepted that from the amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me a moment?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. If I heard the Senator aright, he is proposing an amendment to this substitute which will provide that no preserve, sanctuary, or reservation shall be created without the consent of the particular State in which it is proposed to create it.

Mr. KING. Yes. The bill itself provides that not more than one shall be established without the consent of the legislature of the State.

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator will yield to me, I wish to occupy the time of the Senate a moment.

Mr. KING. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona is recognized.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the general purposes and the scope of this bill are so noble that they almost intuitively, instinctively, commend themselves to the citizen, and I congratulate the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] for the able and painstaking work they have performed in this behalf. There is, however, another important question raised by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]; that is to say, the time has arrived when the executive branch of the Government must not create any more reservations of any sort without the consent of the State in which it is proposed any such reservation should lie. To illustrate:

Arizona contains 113,956 square miles, or 73,931,840 acres. Yet that vast area for all practical purposes is withheld from the people.

Mr. President, enormous tracts of land have been taken for Indian reservations, and of that we did not complain. Still larger areas of the State have been taken for national forests; and in many instances the forest reservations were created, not wholly for forestry purposes but to permit certain persons and corporations holding lands within the forests, to exchange the same and receive in lieu thereof timberlands elsewhere. That was done respecting the creation of some national forests in Arizona.

We must subsist and must maintain a State by land and people on the land. Square mile by square mile, and township by township, sedulously and constantly the Federal Government has reached out until almost all of the land in Arizona upon which we expect to subsist in the future and maintain a State, has been withdrawn from settlement and therefore is not taxable by the State or the counties.

I now enlist the friends of this measure to our support on this vital question. I appeal to all Senators to refuse any further to permit any department to make further withdrawals of lands except upon consent of the State involved. The time has arrived when this principle must be vigorously applied.

The VICE PRESIDENT rose.

Mr. ASHURST. I presume I have occupied all the time to which I am entitled.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the election of a President pro tempore.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will limit that to a certain time, I shall have no objection. If it is temporarily laid aside, can it be called up at any time?

Mr. McNARY. Yes. I have in mind only a desire for the final termination of the consideration of the bill which has been before us.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, some Senators have suggested that but one preserve or sanctuary in a State should be created without the consent of the legislature of the State.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Not more than one preserve.

Mr. KING. My amendment proposes to strike that out.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is provided that one may be created under the terms of the bill not to exceed 2,000 acres.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. ASHURST. With pleasure.

Mr. WALCOTT. May I explain that in line 19 it is provided that no such game farm hereafter established shall exceed 2,000 acres. With that limitation it is further provided that not more than one such game farm shall hereafter be established. Does that meet the Senator's suggestion, or does he object, although it be not more than one and not more than 2,000 acres in extent?

Mr. ASHURST. The very language providing that we must not do it more than once is a conclusive presumption that to go beyond that would be wrong. If a game sanctuary or a reservation is necessary, the legislatures of the various States will respond with avidity and with eagerness.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield the floor.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, for the last two days this subject has been before the Senate. There were numerous amendments suggested and presented. The committee withdrew the bill and on yesterday afternoon a conference was held which was attended by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and the Senators from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK and Mr. CAREY]. So far as the committee was able to ascertain, all of the Senators who had proposed amendments to the bill, with the exception of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], were present at that conference. All of section 4 was stricken out and the entire section 8 was stricken out. Four or five subsections were stricken out and the representatives of the Mountain States were entirely satisfied. We have found no one who objects to the objects of the bill, and we thought that with all those Senators who had objected before having appeared at this conference our substitute would satisfy the Senate. Each of the Senators was there with the exception of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], whose amendment did not go to the heart of the bill but only to a qualification upon appropriations.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understood the Senator from Missouri yesterday, or the day before, when I offered my amendment, he agreed that no appropriations were to be made under the bill, and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], in charge of the bill, made the same statement. I happen to know from long experience that appropriations may be called for. That experience is shown to be correct by the fact that there have been 13 such bills and that whenever there is a bill of this kind a recommendation comes later to the Appropriations Committee for money to establish another division in a bureau. Thirteen of them have already been established.

The Senators in charge of the bill, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], have both assured the Senate that it is not the purpose to establish an additional bureau nor to ask for any appropriation. The amendment I have offered is perfectly simple. It carries out the statement those two Senators have made. It will save the Treasury a very large sum of money. I ask the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Connecticut if they will not accept the amendment, which reads as follows, and is to be inserted at the end of section 6:

Provided further, That no authority is given in this bill for setting up any additional bureau or division in any department or commission, and shall not authorize any additional appropriations for carrying out its purposes.

It seems to me that ought to be done in view of the statements the two Senators have made to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair might suggest that there is an amendment pending.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know there is, but if the Senator is willing for that amendment to be accepted, I shall ask unanimous consent that it may be inserted in the bill now.

Mr. HAWES. I can not agree to that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well; we shall have to vote on it.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, while I have the floor, in referring just for a moment to the amendment which the Senator from Tennessee has introduced, I would like, with the permission of the Senate, to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a statement of the economic phase of the problem, the amount of money invested, the amount of land involved, and so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

The statement is as follows:

The committee has been impressed with the fact that the wildlife problem of America has its economic value; we have a national resource in many respects answerable to the ordinary rules of investment. Disregarding, for the time, the vital but incalculable benefits to health, of wholesome amusement and recreation to Americans, the committee desires at this point to present evidence dealing with cash values and the great financial importance of the investment under consideration.

The recent census figures show that the value of sporting firearms sold to the public during the year 1929 amounted to $21,970,367; the value of ammunition was $43,779,020; the value of fishing tackle, as estimated by the Institute of Fishing Tackle Manufacturers, was $25,000,000.

It has been estimated that sportsmen spent in 1929 an average of $50 apiece in equipment for shooting and fishing, including their purchases of ammunition, firearms, and fishing tackle, as well as clothing, tents, canoes, and motor boats. When we take into consideration the large number of articles which enter into a day's sport, the estimate of $50 per annum seems reasonable as an average annual figure. Even at this low figure the amount sportsmen invest each year in this way at $50 apiece for 13,000,000 people equals $650,000,000. If we include the cost of transportation, wear and tear on automobiles going to and from shooting grounds, the total expenditure of the citizens of the United States in their quest for outdoor recreation in shooting and fishing alone during 1929 would doubtless amount to fully three-quarters of a billion dollars.

These estimates concern only those values realized in the pursuit of wild birds, animals, and fishes for food and sport. By far the greater proportion of Americans who annually go afield to enjoy our wild-life resources and the associations of out-of-doors, do not either shoot game or catch fish for sport. But all of them, nevertheless, are interested in wild life. Their numbers are annually increasing. For example, in 1929, 2,680,597 persons visited the national park areas alone and in 1930, 2,774,561 visited the same areas. The National Association of State Parks indicates that one park area in the State of New York was visited by 13,000,000 people in 1930. Park areas in Michigan were visited during the same period by 8,900,000; in Connecticut by 1,428,514; and in Indiana by 950,000. The same authority estimates that State park areas exclusively throughout the country were visited in 1930 by between forty and forty-five million people seeking outdoor recreation in forest, field, and stream. There are, of course, additional millions of Americans who go afield each year who do not visit established parks, therefore are not registered, and their numbers can not be accurately computed. It is impossible to estimate, even approximately, the tremendous sums annually invested and spent by this vast group of recreationists who are attracted by the ennobling and inspirational qualities associated with all varieties of wild creatures and their environment; but when figures are compiled, they will dwarf any totals so far presented in connection with the activities of fishermen and hunters.

It is estimated that the Federal Government has in national parks an investment of $54,634,935; in fish hatcheries, $3,500,000; in game sanctuaries, between $2,000,000 and $4,000,000. The States own approximately forty-four and a half million acres of various types of land and water which have been set aside as bird and game sanctuaries or reserves. It is believed that the value of these lands would average about $7 per acre. An estimated value of at least $300,000,000 in the aggregate for all State reservations and sanctuaries would not be excessive.

The value, therefore, of investments which the Federal and various State Governments have made for the purpose of preserving or increasing wild life comes to a total of $507,134,935. If to this figure we add the value of private sanctuaries and shooting preserves, the grand total would undoubtedly be at least a billion dollars.

In the direct production of food and clothing items consumed or used by Americans, estimates of the Biological Survey credit the country's wild life with supplying meat and fur each year to the value of $150,000,000. The extent of protection by insect-destroying birds to food and other farm crops is estimated by the Department of Agriculture to be annually $350,000,000.

In considering the place of fish in the national food supply, it is surprising to discover that it ranks third in total quantity amongst meat products in the United States, as shown by the following table of the Bureau of Fisheries:

	Pounds
Pork	8,181,000,000
Beef	7,458,000,000
Fish	2,500,000,000
Veal	960,000,000
Mutton and lamb	643,000,000

This table does not include what might be termed "game fishes."

The annual yield of our commercial fisheries exceeds 3,000,000,000 pounds, valued at $116,000,000 to the fishermen.

There are many other products of the fisheries put to varied uses in the arts and industries. The total value of these by-products of the fisheries is not less than $25,000,000.

The investigation of the wild-life resources of America, therefore, becomes not only a problem of health and recreation, but a problem of large and growing economic importance.

Your committee finds that the total annual subscription in cash by Federal and State Governments specifically to administer this resource, to insure its maintenance, and to secure a continuation of profits from their resources probably does not exceed $12,000,000. The value of the annual dividend to Americans, considering only the tangible assets, is many times this amount. Your committee, therefore, is compelled to report that it believes the primary cause for the gradual and serious decrease in our supply of wild life to be due to the failure of Federal and State legislative bodies to be guided by the ordinary rules of sound business practice which require that the sums used for research, protection, administration, development, and upkeep must be in due proportion to the income derived from its resources.

The enterprise of wild-life conservation and increase viewed solely as a business matter has been grievously underfinanced and small acknowledgment or recognition has been had of its value in dollars to the people of our Commonwealths.

If there is no game for the hunter, no fish for the fisherman, no wild life in the recreational playgrounds for tourists, these occupations and recreations will perish.

While the private individual may assist in (and, when organized into clubs and associations, very largely supplement) the work of the State and Nation, the very character of game and fish preservation depends upon State and National legislation and administration.

The matter of hunting and fishing and outdoor recreation is naturally related to that of the preservation of insectivorous birds and birds of song and plumage, and for reforestation and all other natural resources similar in character.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I am very fond of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR]. I see the point he is trying to make, but it is not necessary. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] and I have both stated to the Senate that the bill does not carry an appropriation; that it does not increase the personnel of the Government. The point was made the other day by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] that the machinery which is set up in section 4 might require additional personnel and might require an expenditure of money. It is the only section of the bill as to which any suggestion has been made that there would be any additional expense. Section 4 has been stricken from the bill, so I would object to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I am rather inclined to think the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] would be perhaps of more benefit for the purposes which the proponents of the bill have in view than in the form in which the bill now presents it. The substitute reads:

Provided, however, That no such game farm hereafter established shall exceed 2,000 acres in size.

That puts a limitation on the one game farm that is proposed to be arbitrarily provided for and upon all subsequent ones. Anyone familiar with conditions of wild life throughout the country and especially in our section knows that there may arise and will arise conditions under which 2,000 acres will be totally inadequate for the preservation and propagation of particular forms of wild life, the more essential forms of wild life. I think the States are all sufficiently aware of the necessity for taking action for the preservation of our Nation's game to readily and willingly cooperate in any form of action the Federal Government may take.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to explain that section?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I shall be very glad to have an explanation.

Mr. HAWES. The Mountain States, with vast areas like Arizona, have problems that are different entirely from the South and the West and the Mississippi Valley. They are afraid that some department of the Government in administering the game farms may use that as an excuse to extend the Federal jurisdiction over this acreage. A game farm requires approximately only 1,000 acres, so that in order to satisfy the Mountain States, which was not done in the original bill, and for their protection we put the limitation of 2,000 acres; that is to say, it might be in a tract of 100,000 acres, but for the purpose of a fish hatchery or a game farm only 1,000 acres would be required, so we put in that language for the protection of the Mountain States.

Mr. SMITH. Does the Senator mean that the game preserve might be in the public domain or located on private property?

Mr. HAWES. Oh, just on public property.

Mr. SMITH. Then the danger that the Mountain States people foresaw was that they might extend it indefinitely, as it was public land.

Mr. HAWES. That is true.

Mr. SMITH. Down in our section of the country we have a peculiar situation. All the lands in the old original States are owned by the States, but down on our coastal plain, among the coastal lands, there are indications that for the breeding and propagation of certain forms of wild life, like wild turkeys, deer, and some of the fur-bearing animals, 2,000 acres would be totally inadequate to preserve and propagate the wild life in those sections. I am not familiar with the conditions existing in the State of my friend from Arizona and similar States where the game is preserved and propagated in vast areas over which it could roam and feed. With us it is not so. The land is more or less all taken up, except some of our swamp lands and some of our very arid sand-hill lands.

In order to preserve wild life adequate areas would have to be provided because good roads, the automobile, and the modern sporting gun are resulting in the rapid extermination of game throughout the old States. The Senator from Connecticut has visited my State, and he knows the hazard to which game life is subjected. In our rivers it is almost impossible to keep a supply of native fish, though the Government has added greatly to the fish wealth of our section by the propagation of fish.

It seems to me that if we are going to legislate for the preservation of game or fish, we should do it in a manner that would be adequate. I do not think—and I believe the Senator from Connecticut, with his knowledge of conditions found in our section, will agree with me—that 2,000 acres would be sufficient for roaming animals and birds. There would not be obtainable in such a restricted territory as that a sufficient food supply to support animal life.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me for just a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. HAWES. I am entirely in sympathy with the Senator's thought; the more acreage we can get into a conservation area the better I should like it; but the language in the bill to which the Senator refers does not apply to game sanctuaries or game preserves; it applies to what are called "game farms," and fish cultural stations, which require only a small acreage.

Mr. SMITH. I was not advised as to that distinction and the differentiation between the terms "game sanctuaries" and "game farms."

Mr. HAWES. It was that distinction which I desired to point out.

Mr. SMITH. If this language applies entirely to farms for the propagation of game, it presents a different aspect.

Mr. HAWES. That is my understanding.

Mr. SMITH. If I had been advised of that distinction, I should have been satisfied, but I wish to make a further observation.

Much has been said here about an appropriation being involved in this proposed legislation. I for one would not balk at any appropriation for this purpose, which, judiciously spent, could preserve and take care of the game and fish life of our country, which throughout our entire section is rapidly vanishing. In my State during the present year an unprecedented drought for three months dried up our swamps and hill lands; forest fires started, and practically two-thirds of all the wood and swamp land in my State was burned bare.

We have no organized fire protection, because such conditions rarely occur, and certainly we have no town in that region of sufficient size and importance to have an organized force to protect game preserves. The consequence is that the wild life, the quail—partridges, as we call them—and the ordinary fur-bearing animals, the deer, and also the wild turkey have been almost decimated. As a consequence of the forest fires there was no food; there was nothing left on which wild life could subsist.

I think it is a matter of both State and National importance to provide that the game life and fish life of the country shall be adequately preserved and protected. For one, I should rather see some of the expenditures which are proposed for other departments eliminated and the food supply for the game life of the country increased. No matter how poor a man may be, there is for him no recreation under the sun comparable to that in the open with rod or gun where he can find an adequate area over which he may roam and find outlet for a natural instinct, which I think is common to rightly constructed man. I have my doubts about any man who does not love to fish and hunt; there is something radically wrong with him somewhere, either mentally, morally, or physically, or all three. I have never in my life seen a man but there was some kind of a repulsive idiosyncracy about him who did not love to hunt and fish. The very highest type of manhood is always expressed in one who loves the out-of-door sports of hunting and fishing. I stand here as a splendid example of that myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry of the Senator from South Carolina?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Does the Senator from South Carolina proceed upon the theory that the States individually are unable to protect game and wild life?

Mr. SMITH. No; I have not discussed that question at all. My contention is that if the Federal Government is going to offer its good offices—and it has offered them almost everywhere—it will be with the consent of my State. That is all right; that is not objectionable to me, though I should object to the Federal Government going into my State, under whatever power it might assert the right to do so, without the consent of the State.

However, as I said in the opening sentence of my remarks, I think, from every standpoint, every State government in America is thoroughly alive to the necessity of preserving our wild life. It is for that reason I wanted to call attention, so far as I am concerned, to the fact that the adequate protection and propagation of the wild life of the country will pay for itself a thousand times over. Any reasonable provision which may be made to protect wild life will do that; and I, for one, am going to support both National and State appropriations for the purpose of providing for the preservation of wild life.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not desire to be misunderstood. I wish it distinctly to be known that I join with the Senator from South Carolina in the sentiments he has just expressed, and I wish I were capable of delivering such a brilliant—I will say dazzling—eulogy of piscatorial delights and pleasures of the sportsman as has my learned friend from South Carolina.

No man could appreciate more than I the treasures of nature, her wonderful works and her gay creatures, and I would much regret that anything should go into the RECORD that might seem to indicate that I had a cynical view of such legislation as that which protects wild life. Indeed, Mr. President, with perfect respect to Senators who have proposed this bill, the amendment of the Senator from Utah will do as much to protect wild life as will any amendment that has been proposed in the Senate.

Mr. President, in order that the Senate may not get the impression that we have singled out this bill, let me say that some time ago it became necessary to provide by law that the President should not establish any Indian reservation without the consent of Congress. It is also necessary to obtain the consent of Congress for the creation of national parks. We have not singled out this bill. It is really an application of the principle that should be applied to all such bills.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I want to express to the Senator from South Carolina my appreciation of his explanation of the purposes of the bill and for his enthusiasm for what it may, and I hope will, accomplish. I also want to add from personal knowledge that the Senator from South Carolina is one of the finest sportsmen of whom I know and is also a true conservationist.

With reference to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], I see no objection to it; but I want to offer this word of explanation. Yesterday afternoon there met, as I have before stated, a number of Senators who had objected to certain portions of this bill. The chief objection voiced yesterday afternoon during the discussion of the bill on the floor of the Senate was in reference to the particular point the Senator from Utah makes; in other words, it involved the desire absolutely to protect State rights against Federal encroachment.

I do not yield to anybody in the desire to protect State rights, whether East, West, North, or South, and I am in entire sympathy with everything the Senator from Utah has said. The same sentiments expressed here this afternoon were expressed yesterday very forcefully by the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK]. It was because of his contentions that we reduced the grant of Federal authority to this particular point, namely, to the creation of game farms, which are merely small experimental stations designed to increase the supply of game and to fish cultural stations designed to increase the supply of fish, and also provided the small numerical limit of only one in each State, in order to avoid possibly a lot of red tape and the delays which might be incurred in passing this bill through the Federal Congress. It was for that reason that we offered this amendment which yesterday satisfied the representatives of the Western States. Utah, however, was not represented at the meeting, as I did not know that the Senator from Utah objected to anything in the bill. I wish he had been there. I accept, and I am sure all the other members of the committee will accept the amendment of the Senator from Utah. We are entirely satisfied with it. It was only intended to save a little time and some red tape in establishing what possibly might be necessary game farms, not for the preservation but for the propagation of game.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I thank the Senator in charge of the bill for accepting the amendment. My only reason for offering it was to guard against what I have discovered, namely, the increasing appetite of Federal officials and Federal bureaus to invade the rights of the States. The Mountain States, my own State, and others, to my knowledge, have been the victims of the avarice of Federal officials who take charge of some of the public lands and who impinge upon the rights of individuals as well as upon the rights of the States.

As stated by my friend from Montana [Mr. WALSH] yesterday, Congress has been constrained to pass a law to prohibit the Executive from carving out of the public domain any area and establishing it as a reserve or carving it out for any purpose. The President has to come to Congress now and obtain legislation to accomplish that result. I know in my State efforts have been made to detach from the public domain considerable areas and to attach them to Indian reservations and to forest reserves and to make them subject to the control of some particular bureau. I trust, in view of the prejudice—the legitimate prejudice—which exists in my State against such invasions of the Federal Government, that the amendment which I have suggested may be accepted.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] as well.

Two provisos were added to section 5 to meet the views, and perhaps the objections, of some of the Senators from the West. One of them provided that no game farm hereafter established shall exceed 2,000 acres in size. The other provided that not more than one such game farm shall hereafter be established in any State without the consent of the legislature of that State. The last proviso has now been amended so as to provide that no such game farm shall hereafter be established in any State without the consent of the legislature of that State.

Seeing that no game farm can be established in any State without the consent of the legislature of that State, there would seem to be no longer any occasion for limiting the size of the farm, because whenever it is proposed that a farm shall be created it must have the approval of the legislature. So I respectfully suggest that the purpose of the first proviso has been entirely met, and that it ought to be eliminated from the bill.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I was absent from the Chamber when this amendment was offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. I am interested in the question that has just been asked by the Senator from Montana.

If the amendment as proposed would authorize the establishment of more than one game farm in Wyoming, I am opposed to such amendment.

When the bill was under consideration by the committee, it was not the intention of the Senators from Wyoming to express the wish that one game farm might be established in the State, but to limit the provision to one farm and to limit the area of that farm to 2,000 acres.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. KENDRICK. I yield.

Mr. HAWES. The Senator is entirely correct. The limitation of 2,000 acres was to prevent an abuse through the taking over of tremendous bodies of land when only 2,000 acres were required for this purpose.

Mr. KENDRICK. At the time I understood the change to mean that only one game farm might be established in a State without the consent of the legislature of that State.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator that there were two provisos contemplating the creation of game farms by the action of the Federal authorities. It was provided first that no game farm thus created should be of a greater extent than 2,000 acres.

Mr. KENDRICK. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We then went further, and provided that no more than one such game farm should be established in any State without the consent of the legislature of the State. That has now been amended so that it is provided that no game farm shall be established in any State without the consent of the legislature.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator pardon me? Except that one may be established in Wyoming without the consent of that State, as a part of my amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh! I did not know that.

Mr. KING. May I read it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming further yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KENDRICK. I do.

Mr. KING (reading:)

Provided further, That no such game farm, except one in the State of Wyoming, shall hereafter be established in any State without the consent of the legislature.

So the one which has been agreed upon in Wyoming may be established without the consent of the legislature.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is an entirely new idea to me. Let me understand why the Senator chose to select out the State of Wyoming for specific provision?

Mr. KING. Because I understood, in talking with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], that it had been agreed yesterday that the people of Wyoming had assented to the establishment of one without the consent of the legislature; that they were satisfied that one should be established now.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, no! In the consideration of this matter yesterday, on consultation with the Senator from Missouri, the Senator from Connecticut, and some of the Western Senators, including the junior Senator from Wyoming, we had agreed upon these provisos, namely, that no more than one game farm could be established in any State without the consent of the legislature, and that that game farm should not be greater than 2,000 acres.

Mr. KING. I understand.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the only assent that the people of Wyoming have ever given, as I understand the matter, to the creation of any reserve in their State without the consent of the legislature. I take it that the junior Senator from Wyoming was merely expressing to the Senator from Utah what the agreement was in this conference of yesterday; but if every other State is exempted from the creation within its borders of a game farm except upon the consent of the legislature of the State, why should we give the Federal authorities the right to create this game farm in Wyoming without the consent of the Legislature of Wyoming?

Mr. KENDRICK. I agree fully with the statement made by the Senator from Montana. I believe that I express the viewpoint of my colleague, as well as myself, when I say that personally we are willing to have this game farm that was discussed in the committee yesterday established in Wyoming; and there is no doubt whatsoever in my mind but that the legislature of the State will approve such establishment, provided the acreage is limited. I therefore prefer to have the exception of Wyoming stricken from the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me, I was entirely unaware of the amendment of the Senator from Utah. He advised me this morning that it was his purpose to propose an amendment so that it should read:

That no such game farm shall hereafter be established in any State without the consent of the legislature.

But as presented, apparently, it reads:

That no such game farm, except one in the State of Wyoming, shall hereafter be established in any State without the consent of the legislature of that State.

I wonder if the Senator from Utah will not consent that the exception be stricken from the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KENDRICK. I yield.

Mr. KING. I should be very glad to have that done, as I drew the amendment, and it was suggested by the Senator from Montana; but, as I understood the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], he indicated that that might not be satisfactory only for the reason that they had already established one, not perhaps officially; and, as I understood, he did not want the prohibition to extend to the one which had been established at least de facto, if not de jure. I should very much prefer, of course, the amendment as I originally conceived it, so that none could be established in Wyoming or anywhere else without the consent of the legislature.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the senior Senator from Wyoming yield to his colleague?

Mr. KENDRICK. I yield.

Mr. CAREY. I spoke to the Senator from Utah this morning when he suggested his amendment to the bill and told him that there were certain lands in Wyoming which were adapted for a game refuge and which I thought possibly would be given for that purpose. In so far as the amendment is concerned, however, I think it would be much better with the words "except one in the State of Wyoming" left out of it, because I know that our legislature would agree to the establishment of this farm.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall be very happy to have that modification made. I inserted that merely, as I supposed, to meet the desire of the Senator from Wyoming.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator please modify his amendment as he wishes to have it read?

Mr. KING. Yes, Mr. President. I offer the following amendment:

That no such game farm shall hereafter be established in any State without the consent of the legislature of that State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, it is gratifying to me that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah has been accepted by those in charge of the bill.

This measure relates largely to the so-called public-land States of the West. With the steady, constant, and progressive encroachment of the Federal Government in those States resting heavily upon us, the principle involved in the amendment is important.

The mere establishment of one so-called game farm in each State to embrace a limited area is not so important, but the policy of the Government in expanding its authority and encroaching more and more upon the Western States has become so onerous that those of us from that area are always anxious to minimize and reduce it.

I make no criticism of the authors of the measure in this particular respect, because they have done a commendable work in conducting an exhaustive survey throughout the country, and have brought to us a bill commendable in principle; but, Mr. President, the policy of the Government exercising exclusive jurisdiction over more and more of the territory of the Western States is a thing about which we are extremely anxious. That policy was conducted for years under the guise of extending Indian reservations by Executive authority. That became so pernicious to the welfare of those States that a few years ago Congress saw fit to provide that no more reservations should be created or enlarged through that method, so that that particular phase of the injury has been corrected.

But, Mr. President, this is a step in the same dangerous direction, or was a step in that direction before the authors of the measure accepted the amendment of the Senator from Utah. I take occasion to protest, on behalf of one of the Western States, against the ever-increasing encroachment of Federal authority in that area.

In my own State 43 per cent of the land is under Federal jurisdiction, over which the State authorities exercise limited or no jurisdiction whatever. Upon Indian reservations the State authorities have no jurisdiction in the matter of enforcing the criminal laws except respecting violations committed by whites. Upon other areas its jurisdiction is circumscribed. That enormous area is nontaxable, nonrevenue bearing, and nonincome producing in character, so far as the State is concerned. With that situation the State government and local county governments have struggled for years with only 57 per cent of their territory subject to domestic authority so far as levying taxes and requiring tribute to the expenses of government are concerned.

I commend the authors of the bill for accepting the amendment of the Senator from Utah, because it harmonizes with good administration of government as between State and Federal authorities.

I hope, too, Mr. President, that the amendment which the Senator from Tennessee has announced his purpose to introduce will be adopted, to the effect that no appropriations will be made to carry the provisions of this act into effect.

It has been said by the authors of the bill sincerely, and with perfect good faith, that the administration of this measure does not contemplate appropriations. I do not question their good faith in that respect, but I confidently believe that in only a few short years at most the executive department will come to Congress with an estimate asking for an appropriation to administer the act. It will be said then that the Congress cast this burden upon these departments and bureaus; that is to say, charged them with the duty of doing the things directed in the act, and that in order to do them, in order to carry forward the program already established and started, money is necessary. Then the urge will be made upon the committees of the House and the Senate to make appropriations with which to carry forward the work already initiated and already under way. The argument will be persuasive at that time and we will pay heed to it.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. BARKLEY rose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield?

Mr. BRATTON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I was simply going to suggest that in case conditions arise, which the Senator thinks likely will arise, the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee will go down. That will not protect at all.

Mr. BRATTON. Except that it will declare the intention of the Congress not to appropriate money to carry this act into effect; and if the departments initiate a program looking to that end, their argument for an appropriation will not be persuasive in the face of a congressional declaration made at the very outset.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BRATTON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The question I had intended to ask was similar to that propounded by the Senator from Idaho. While it may be a very good gesture to forewarn the departments that this is not intended to lead to an appropriation, it will have no binding effect on future Congresses, and if the situation is changed in the future it might have no effect upon the determination as to whether we ought not to make an appropriation in the attempt to further this activity.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I realize that a provision of this kind would be no more than a declaration, but without some kind of a pronouncement on the subject the departments will inaugurate a system of administration under the act, and in a few years they will come to Congress with the statement that in order to carry that program forward, to do the things enjoined upon them under the act, money is necessary, and that they have had no warning that Congress did not intend to provide the money with which to carry that program forward. At least a declaration of this kind would obviate that sort of a situation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRATTON. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky and of others who are interested to the fact that according to the recent message of the President known as the Budget message there are demands for separate appropriations under 13 different wild game laws just like this proposed law. This would make the fourteenth. Under each one of those laws there has grown up what they call a division. They do not call it a bureau, but it is in fact a bureau. They call it a division in the Biological Survey. I have just called the Senator's attention to the fact that out of the appropriations of $1,700,000, $436,227 are for salaries in the 13 bureaus, which already exist here in the city of Washington.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield?

Mr. BRATTON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I realize the force of what the Senator from Tennessee says. I have not looked into the details of those 13 different divisions or bureaus under the Budget message, but I am wondering whether they overlap, or whether they are all devoted to separate types of wild life we are attempting to conserve.

Mr. McKELLAR. Although the proponents of this bill say that there is not to be any appropriation under it, although they have assured the Senate of that fact, yet they are not willing to put that statement in the bill, and I want to say that I have looked into the matter of these 13 different recommendations under these 13 different laws, and when the Senator from New Mexico gets through, and I get the floor, I shall have something to say about that.

Mr. BARKLEY. The mere fact that there are 13 bureaus dealing with wild life would not frighten me in any respect with reference to this particular bill. If this bill is needed, if it is the kind of legislation we ought to enact, and it shall develop in the future that there would have to be some small appropriation to carry it out, I would not be against it because of that.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is entirely right in that; I would not, either. But this is to be a coordination of the present 13, as the proponents of this bill say.

Mr. HAWES. Oh, no.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate only a moment longer.

Mr. HAWES. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment at this time?

Mr. BRATTON. I yield.

Mr. HAWES. The figures which the Senator from Tennessee has been giving to the Senate involve 25 years of department growth in the Biological Survey and the Department of Agriculture. The appropriations for all those departments are less this year than they were last year. There is no coordination proposed in this bill between those departments. The coordination is between the heads of all the departments in the interest of economy, so that there may not be a duplication of effort, so that there may be an understanding, not of the Biological Survey and the Bureau of Fisheries but each department in the President's Cabinet. There is no appropriation asked for under this bill. None is necessary. An attempt to bind some succeeding Congress in what Congress might determine at that time is not a part of this bill, which we believe is a measure in economy not only of wild life but in the expenditure of money.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, of course it is not the desire of anyone to bind a subsequent Congress, but the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee would be to declare that in passing this measure of coordination it is not the purpose of the Congress to create additional machinery which will necessitate further expenditures from the Treasury.

The Senator from Missouri says that the appropriations sought this year for this work are less than those of last year. That is encouraging, because instead of talking about additional sources of income we should talk seriously and earnestly about ways of reducing expenditures from the Treasury. Much is being said now about additional sources of revenue, means of providing more money for the Treasury. We should talk about less expenditures from the Treasury. Economy should be the watchword.

If it is the purpose of the proponents of the measure to coordinate the activities of this department, without additional expense, and to reduce expenditures, I see no reason for objecting to a declaration to that effect in the measure.

I hope very much that the amendment sponsored by the Senator from Tennessee will be adopted, so that our understanding in passing the measure respecting its operation without additional expenditure may stand as a part of the legislation itself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I was about to suggest that I would ask for the regular order.

Mr. HAWES. Only one amendment has been offered.

Mr. NORRIS. That one amendment has been pending all day.

Mr. McKELLAR. When the pending amendment shall be acted on, I will offer another amendment. I think it will take some time to dispose of my amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I suggest also that I am informed that it is desired that we have an executive session. A large number of appointments are on the Executive Calendar to be passed on, and we want to have an executive session before we adjourn to-day.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, when I asked unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside I thought there was more or less of an understanding that it would be brought up within a very short time and that we would have a vote on the unfinished business immediately after we disposed of the pending bill.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I thought, but apparently this bill is not going to be disposed of to-day.

Mr. McNARY. Would the Senator from Nebraska be content to allow another hour to be taken in consideration of the pending bill and then have the unfinished business taken up?

Mr. NORRIS. As far as I personally am concerned, I have no objection to that, but suppose we say half an hour. Will that be time enough?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, frankly, if my amendment is to be contested, I do not think the argument on it can be concluded in half an hour.

Mr. NORRIS. As far as I am concerned, I will not make any demand for the regular order for half an hour, at least, and if at the end of that time there is any probability that we can get through with the pending bill in a few minutes, we can run right along.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection to whatever course may be desired.

Mr. NORRIS. Is that satisfactory to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. McNARY. That is all right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to the proposed substitute.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, while we are on this matter, let me ask the Senator from Tennessee whether it would not be agreeable to have the subject completed before his amendment is offered?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is entirely agreeable.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Agreeably to what I said a while ago, I move that the first proviso on page 4 of the bill be stricken from the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be reported.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 4, line 19, the Senator from Montana proposes to strike out the words "Provided, however, That no such game farm hereafter established shall exceed 2,000 acres in size."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My view is that that is entirely unnecessary, by reason of the amendment made on the motion of the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], providing that no game farm, whatever may be its size, may be established in any State without the consent of the legislature. Accordingly, there is no occasion for this language.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, on page 5 of the amended bill now before us I offer the following amendment. Insert at the end of the last paragraph the following proviso:

Provided further, That no authority is given in this bill for setting up any additional bureau or division in any department or commission and shall not authorize any additional appropriations for carrying out its purposes.
